MOSLEM ALLIANCE IN LEBANON GAINS MOUNTAIN AREAS

Gunmen Battling for Control of Region From Beirut to the Syrian Border

By HENRY TANNER
Special to The New York Times

JIWAR EL-HAWZ, Lebanon, March 27—Moslem and leftist forces are on the move along the steep, rocky slopes of these mountains 25 miles east of Beirut in a slow-moving but crucial battle that is probably more important than the fighting in Beirut.

The drive is providing the leverage that Kamal Jumblat, the most powerful politician in the leftist-Moslem alliance, was using today in Damascus as he sought to obtain from the Syrians the resignation of President Suleiman Franjieh as well as much more extensive constitutional changes than the Christian conservatives have so far been willing to concede.

One of the principal objectives of the leftist-Moslem drive is to link up with villages in which Christian leftists hold sway but which are surrounded by other villages held by right-wing Christian Phalangist forces.

Drive to Link Village

Another objective, according to Moslem officers, is to outflank Phalangist forces remaining in the foothills southeast of Beirut and to force them to withdraw to areas northeast of the city, thus leaving the Moslem-left alliance in full control of the countryside between the capital and the Syrian border.

If the achieve this goal, the leftist Moslem forces can pose a threat to the Kasraw area that the Maronite Christian conservatives intend to hold at all cost in the case of any partition of Lebanon between Moslems and Christians.

If the Kasrawan can be threatened, partition may be prevented because it will no longer be attractive to the right-wing Christians, the Jumblat strategists maintain.

This Maronite Christian hamlet, high on a slope between patches of pine and small terraced apple and peach orchards, was taken by leftist-

BEAME CONFERS AFTER STALEMATE IN TRANSIT TALKS

Following Mediation Session He Describes Situation as 'Grave' and 'Disturbing'

FARE RISE 'UNTHINKABLE'

Mayor Says the Fiscal Crisis Calls for Responsibility —Offers Personal Aid

By EMANUEL PERLMUTTER

Mayor Beame met with the three mediators in the stalemated transit negotiations yesterday and later described the situation as "grave and very disturbing."

The Mayor said there was no money in the city treasury to help finance any raises in a new contract between the Transport Workers Union and the Transit Authority.

Asked whether in view of the city's fiscal plight, the situation called for special cooperation by the unions, he replied, "It calls for responsibility, but there has been no indication of any here yet."

Best Effort Urged

Mr. Beame expressed these opinions at a news conference on the steps of Gracie Mansion, after a 90-minute meeting with the panel, which consists of Vincent D. McDonnell, the chairman, who is also head of the State Mediation Board Joseph E. O'Grady, former chairman of the Transit Authority, and Michael J. Sovern a law professor at Columbia University. Theodore W. Kheel labor adviser to the Mayor, also took part in the meeting.

The Mayor said it would be "unthinkable" for the authority to raise the present 50-cent fare. He said he would be available to become more personally involved in the negotiations if it would help, and he urged the mediators to do their best to help promote a contract settlement that could avert a strike.

Freeze Might Be Bypassed

The mediators had met with the Mayor, starting at noon after a one-hour negotiating session between the union and the authority in the morning at the Americana Hotel.

There have been reports that persons close to the contract negotiations have been saying privately that the 34,000 bus and subway workers might be able to get a cost-of-living raise if the authority could finance it through productivity gains. This would get around the present wage freeze on city and other public employees brought on by the city's financial crisis. The state wage freeze permits cost-of-living adjustments.

Asked whether a cost-of-living raise was being considered, Mr. McDonnell said at the Gracie Mansion news confer-

...Fighting to Retain ...e in Election Outlays

By WARREN WEAVER Jr.
Special to The New York Times

...TON, March 27—Organized labor is fighting ...nd sometimes camouflaged battle to retain ...ical weapon—the right to spend unlimited, unreported amounts of money from the union treasury to support candidates.

Unions, like corporations, are prohibited from using their dues money to make direct campaign contributions. Generally, they are allowed to set up political committees to collect voluntary contributions from members and then distribute the proceeds among pro-labor candidates.

In 1971, however, Congress approved a relatively obscure amendment to the campaign law that expanded radically the political potential of unions. It permitted them to spend any amount of their resources to communicate with their members "on any subject."

As a result, labor can devote unmeasured thousands of dollars to set up a telephone bank for a political candidate, carry on mass mailings in his behalf and conduct door-to-door canvasses, as long as the voters reached are all members of the union that is paying the bills.

Corporations Appear Wary

In the current Congressional debate over revising the campaign law, Republicans are trying to compel unions to report this kind of spending, how much and for whom, just as all other political spending is reported under the current disclosure law. Labor is resisting fiercely.

The issue has been partly clouded by the fact that the law of 1971 gave corporations the same right to use corporate funds to communicate with their stockholders. But this did

Egypt Hunts Urgently for Arms Sources

By DREW MIDDLETON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 27—The Egyptian Government has begun a hurried, almost frantic search for equipment to maintain its Soviet-made arms and for new weaponry to replace Russian matériel.

President Anwar el-Sadat will visit West Germany, France, Italy and Yugoslavia to discuss arms purchases in those countries. Egyptian officials have begun talks in London on the possible purchase of Chieftan tanks and new engines for the T-62 Soviet tanks now in Egypt's forces.

Qualified Egyptian sources here concede that the Government is "groping around" to find weapons that will maintain a military balance in the Middle East. At the moment, they consider that Israeli military procurement in the United States has shifted the balance in that country's favor despite the continued delivery of Soviet arms to Syria.

President Sadat disclosed in Cairo yesterday that he intended to ask the United States for "defensive weapons," including modern fighters such as the F-5E and the TOW antitank missile.

Sadat to Seek U.S. Arms

Military sources here questioned whether such arms could be classified as defensive. The F-5E, they pointed out, while a less sophisticated aircraft than the MIG-21's and MIG-23's now in the Egyptian Air Force, have a combat radius, when armed with two Sidewinder air-to-air missels, of 875 miles, or sufficient for the aircraft to operate over the Sinai Peninsula from bases in the Nile Delta.

Similarly the TOW missile can be used offensively from jeeps or armed cars when accompanying armor and infantry on attack.

Egyptian sources emphasize that the supply of Soviet spare parts, including engines for the air force's fighters and fighter bombers, has been "locked up" by the Russians. This also is true, United States sources said, of spare parts for Egyptian surface-to-air and surface-to-surface missiles.

Unless Egypt is able to obtain spare parts for these and other weapons, the sources said, it will face a period of two to three years in which the army

Unexpected Crowds Delay Some Trains in Opening of 4.6-Mile Section

By BEN A. FRANKLIN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 27—Washingtonians lined up by the thousands today for free rides on a short inaugural stretch of the Metro, the city's new subway system. By afternoon, the unexpected throng was overloading the cars and causing delays throughout the system.

On some of the crowded early trains there was spontaneous applause for the rapid and quiet contrast to the traffic on the streets overhead.

The rush-hour running time for a bus traveling the same 4.6-mile midtown distance covered by the opening leg of the subway, from Rhode Island Avenue and Eighth Street N. E. to Connecticut Avenue and L Street N. W., is 28 minutes. Some Metro trains this morning made it in 7 minutes.

45-Minute Delays

But train movements were delayed later, some for 45 minutes, as the lines of curious people outside station kiosks extended for two to three blocks, and cars became overloaded with more than the 175 passengers they were designed to hold.

A Metro spokesman said the weight of 200 or more persons jammed into the subway cars had caused the cars to "sag slightly in the middle," binding the door-closing mechanisms and holding trains in stations until some reluctant riders could be persuaded to debark.

There were no reported disorders among what the spokes-

At an Argentine Party After the Coup

By JONATHAN KANDELL
Special to The New York Times

BUENOS AIRES, March 27—This was the first weekend after the military coup, and the collapse of the three-year-old Peronist government gave a special glow to the sumptuous dinner parties that still make upper-class Argentines the social lions of Latin America.

The guests began to arrive only around 11 last night at Mario's 10-room apartment in the Palermo district overlooking the city's most elegant causeway, the 10-lane Avenida Libertador. It was dawn before the last of the 26 revelers straggled out of the marble-lined lobby.

There was the usual mixture of young estancieros—wealthy farmers — middle-aged businessmen, artistic personalities, fashion models and idle rich.

"My husband is so happy over the coup that he's going to pay taxes for the first time ever," said the wife of an agricultural-machinery contractor.

"That's right," her husband said. "All my friends are saying the same thing. We really want to see this Government succeed. If these military fellows are as serious as they look, we'll get serious also."

Tax evasion is widespread in Argentina. The former Peronist government acknowledged last year that nonpayment of personal income taxes had reached more than 70 percent. Most people here say that was an optimistic estimate.

The gap between government revenues and expenditures—partly a result of tax evasion—has been bridged by the printing of huge amounts of paper money. This in turn has generated a rate of inflation that reached 330 percent last year.

Mario, the party's host, gave his guests a quick tour of the premises, pointing out

Peking Is Said to Be Moderating Its Campaign Against 'Rightists'

By FOX BUTTERFIELD
Special to The New York Times

HONG KONG, March 27—The campaign against so-called rightists in China appears to have shifted into a more moderate phase, with fewer stridently worder attacks and new calls in the Chinese press to turn the controversy into what would be a relatively innocuous study movement.

One major article this week in the official daily, Jenmin Jih Pao, titled "We Must Put Study in First Place," suggested that the Chinese people might need "one or two years" of study to understand the issues raised in the conflict.

Other recent articles and broadcasts have contained renewed calls for emphasizing production, a theme virtually ignored when the controversy broke out in early February after the death of Prime Minister Chou En-lai.

Analysts here believe a decision was reached in Peking earlier this month to restrict the target of the campaign largely to Teng Hsiap-ping, the senior Deputy Prime Minister, and to exempt most other senior leaders. The decision was a compromise, the analysts feel, with moderates in the party and army evidently agreeing to Mr. Teng's disgrace in return for setting strict limits on the campaign.

Whether the new moderate

South African troops and vehicles being ferried out of Angola into South-West Africa

South Africa Pulls Out Last Troops From Angola

RUACANA, Angola, March 27, (Reuters)—South African troops completed their withdrawal from Angola today, pulling back into Southwest Africa after their intervention in the Angolan civil war.

The South African Defense Minister, Pieter W. Botha, took the salute as the last convoy of armored cars rolled across the Cunene River border bridge.

"This is the end of a chapter," he said, "but I hope the beginning of a better chapter."

Mr. Botha added: "We want peace but until peace exists properly we shall be on the alert and shall remain on our side of the border to protect the interests for which we are responsible."

Refugees Cross River

Two battalions of troops, including black soldiers, crossed the bridge to end a South African involvement that began last August.

The troops first went in to protect the Ruacana hydroelectric plant, a joint project of South Africa and Angola's former Portuguese rulers. When completed, the project will surrly power and water to South-West Africa as well as to Angola.

Hundreds of Angolan refugees, black and white, were reported to have fled into South-West Africa as the troops completed their withdrawal.

South African defense officials said that about 1,600 refugees made a dash for safety, fearing reprisals by victorious forces of the Angolan Government.

The officials said that the refugees apparently swam or canoed across the crocodile-infested Kavango River, leaving most of their possessions behind.

South African forces had been caring for the refugees in camps in southern Angola until today's final pullout.

1 Refugee families told reporters yesterday that they feared 4iss eiecution by the Angolan Gcvernment forces because they had supported Western-backed movements against the Soviet-supported Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola in the civil war. g'r. Popular Movement troops stood close by as the South African troops completed the withdrawal.

The South African troops first moved north in support of the two Western-oriented forces—the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and the National Front for the Liberation of Angola that opposed the Popular Movement based in Luanda.

But the South Africans pulled back to the border region when the Soviet-armed and Cuban-led Popular Movement forces counterattacked and pushed South to eventual victory.

Today's final South African withdrawal follows assurances from the Angolan Government on the protection of the hydroelectric project, according to South African statements.

In New York last night Angola accused South Africa of aggression and asked the United Nations Security Council to demand that the South Africans pay compensation for economic and other damage caused by the invasion.

Appearing before the United Nations for the first time, a representative of the Angolan Government said that South Africa had used sophisticated weapons, including tanks and 140-millimeter guns, but had suffered heavy losses.

Chirac Opens Drive for Giscard Against French Left

By JAMES F. CLARITY
Special to The New York Times

NICE, France, March 27—Prime Minister Jacques Chirac, in his new official role as chief protagonist for the administration of President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, opened a nationwide campaign today to convince the French that if the leftist opposition gained national power, the result would be "permanent crisis."

Mr. Chirac, who was designated by the President three days ago to galvanize the anti-leftist effort in the nation, asserted that the French must choose between a society of "liberal reform and liberty" and the "Socialist-Communist reform" of the left.

Others Attack Lefists

He made it clear in a speech to a convention of 100 elected officials of Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's party, the Independent Republicans, that the general enemy in the new campaign was "the danger" of Communism, while the specific foe was François Mitterand, the Socialist leader, whose party made sizable gains in local elections two weeks ago.

Other prominent political supporters of Mr. Giscard d'Estaing also made harsh anti-Communist and antileftist speeches and remarks here during a three-day convention of the Independent Republican members of the National Assembly and Senate. Mr. Chirac, the leading figure in the Gaullist party, told the Giscardists that "rivalries and dissensions" between the Republican and Gaullist parties must be put aside in the accelerated antileft effort.

Declaring that the new campaign began today, he urged the Giscardists to go home and explain the choice between "leftist" and "liberal" society that is to be made by the nation's voters in the legislative elections two years from now. Mr. Chirac is expected to make a similar appeal to the elected members of his own party, the Gaullists, who meet next Tuesday in St. Jean-de-Luz, on the Atlantic coast of southwest France.

The Independent Republicans, who are second to the Gaullists in the number of members in the center-right majority in Parliament, came to Nice grumbling over Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's political and governmental policies, which Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's political and governmental policies, which they felt had helped the left to gain in the recent elections, threatening the defeat of the center-right parliamentary majoridty in the 1978 National Assembly elections.

The Independent Republicans are leaving Nice in an apparently better mood, having been assured by Mr. Chirac and several Giscardist ministers that they would soon have a concrete program of legislation for moderate social and economic changes in their developing re-election campaigns.

The Republicans expressed annoyance that Mr. Giscard d'Estaing has spent the first 22 months in office aloof from public participation in politics, haping to win traditonally left-st voters away from the Socialists and Mr. Mitterrand, whom he narrowly defeated for the presidency in 1974.

The Giscardists, mostly well-to-do, middle-aged men of prestigious provinccial families, also seemed relieved that their leader has decided ot limit the scope of economic changes he proposed early in his tenure. The proposed capital gains and real estate development taxes haev apparently been diluted to the point where they will cause no political difficulties for the Parliament members or their relatively conservative constituents.

The presidential proposals for giving workers more control in industrial management are also expected to be limited when the National Assembly opens its spring session next month.

Immediate Action Urged

"The problem wi thGiscard's original reformms," said a Republican National Assembly member, "was that he announced them too soon, then watched them disintegrate. When you have a reform, you must announce it one day, then act on it right away."

The fear among Giscardist political strategists that the leftist opposition is a genuine threat to the center-right majority was unmistakable here.

Acknowledging, in effect, that that the presidential proposals for a capital gains tax have been diluted, Mr. Chirac promised, however, that the Parliament would approve a tax revision "to abolish excessive and scandalous privileges" of an undisclose number of Frenchmen.

Interior Minister Michel Poniatowski, one of Mr. Giscard d'Estaing's closest advisers, said the opposition left had effectively plunged France into a "civil war without arms" by provoking recent strikes and street demonstrations around the country. Asserting that "the French people want peace and calm," he said that his own party, the Independent Republicans, would give its "complete support" to Mr. Chirac in the Prime Minister's role as leade fo the antileft campaign.

The Independent Republican acknowledge in interviews and conversations that there has been sharp disagreements wit Mr. Chirac and his Gaullist pa ty in the last two years. Essen tially, the Gaullists are mon nationalistic than tthe Indepen dent Republicans. The Gaullist have opposed Mr. Giscard d'Es taing's general policy of Frene cooperation with the North At lantic Treaty Organization an his willingness to involve Franc in closer relationships with oth er West European countries.

But it said it could not sanction the endorsement that the Soviet and Rumanian invitations provide to reactionary political organizations that defend the interests of big capital in our country." The French Communists also viewed the invitations as lending support to the "Giscardien political power that is directed against the working class and youth of France, against détent and European cooperation."

The communique went on to say that the French Communist youth movement is "for its part, profoundly attached to proletarian internationalism" and that the movement deplored Soviet interference "in the struggle which is is waging, and will continue to wage, for profound democratic changes and socialism in France."

The reference to "proletarian internationalism" was highly ironic. The phrase is customarily used by Moscow to require support for Soviet policy by foreign Communist parties.

According to Le Monde, the letter in which this theme was developed more formally and officially was delivered at a preparatory meeting of European Communists held in East Berlin earlier this month. The Communist parties have been negotiating for well over a year to draft a document that they could issue at a joint conference, originally scheduled for last summer but still beyond the horizon.

Apparently the French party now threatens not to participate unless the other Communist parties go along with its militant position on fighting capitalism.

This is a new obstacle for the conference. Until now, it was blocked by Soviet refusal to go along with demands of the Italian, Spanish, Yugoslav and Rumanian Communist parties for full autonomy and independence.

Party Stands Differ

The French and Italian Communist positions differ markedly. The s have been discreet at tacking the Russians, alt h they have taken stands far more challenging to Soviet orthodoxy than have the French. The Italian Communist leader, Enrico Berlinguer, attended the Soviet party's 25th congress recently, and delivered an independent-minded speech. The French communist leader Georges Marchais, refused to go and criticized the Soviet interpretation of "proletarian internat internationalism" from Paris.

Although the French Communists recently joined the Italian Communists in proclaiming their devotion to democratic government, civil liberties and national communism, they face different domestic political situations and have adopted different tactics.

The Italians are seeking power through a coalition in which they would cooperate with the ruling Christian Democratic Party and seek to meld their Marxist support with that of the Italian masses.

Mr. Berlinguer has said that 51 percent of the vote would not be enough to achieve effective, stable government, and Italian Communists point to the failure of Communist parties in Chile and Portugal as examples of the mistake of trying to change social systems without broad popular backing.

ADULT EDUCATION LAGGING IN FRANCE

Plan to Aid Employees Said to Evoke Little Interest

Special to The New York Times

PARIS, March 27—After four and a half years a project extending educational opportunities to employees in France has bogged down, largely because of an apparent lack of interest among the potential beneficiaries.

"Far too few Frenchmen take advantage of the legal opportunity for improving their professional skills or general background through adult education," said Paul Granet, who until recently was State Secretary for Professional Training.

A permanent adult-education program was adopted in July 1971 under a reform-minded Gaullist Prime Minister, Jacques Chaban-Delmas, with the aim of social, and thus financial, advancement—a better-trained worker would get a better job with higher pay.

Under the plan management set aside the equivalent of 1 percent of salaries. The money pays those attending classes at the same rate as if they were on the job.

Courses Are Suggested

In exchange, management has the preponderant voice in suggesting the courses employees should take to improve skills of special use. So far union representatives have had a largely consultative role.

The classrooms and teachers are funded by the state.

A vast majority of the classes offer useful knowledge—techniques for industry and agriculture as well as such subjects as accounting and law.

Some classes, among them literature and history, dispense culture for its own sake, while languages are a borderline case.

An American teacher of adults in Paris found that the majority in his English class were jobless white-collar workers, most of whom were there because they had the time.

Attendance Stays Small

Only 250,000 people in a work force of 21 million got promotions after attending adult-education courses in 1974, the last year for which complete statistics are available. The number of adults attending evening classes — as distinct from classes during working hours—is about 120,000 now.

The lack of interest in the program is typified by what happened to the head of a successful Paris housecleaning enterprise employing over 100. He set aside the requisite 1 percent of salaries but found that none of his employees were interested in returning to school. To use up at least a little of the fund he went himself to learn Portuguese because some of his charwomen are Portuguese immigrants.

One thing that seems to have gone wrong is public relations. The new official in charge, Jean-Pierre Soisson, said recently that his priority was "a campaign of information so that people would at least know they have access to more education."

As acknowledged by President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing's Government, the law setting up the system underestimated the time required for adult studies to be fruitful, with the maximum length of courses foreseen at 160 hours.

New Discussions Held

The law was drawn up on the basis of negotiations between management and union representatives. Since last month they have been discussing the subject anew. The unions want paid study time to be lengthened and seek a guarantee that those successfully completing courses get automatic promotions.

Mr. Granet, the former supervisor of the program, is on record with an even broader proposal. He would give every salaried person the right to extended "education vacations" once or twice in a lifetime for up to a year. He believes a law improving the system could pass Parliament before summer.

Adult education in this country goes back to 1833, when evening classes were instituted in the reign of King Louis-Philippe. School was not compulsory, so the classes met with huge success. By 1869 close to 800,000 adults were attending. With compulsory education evening classes declined, to be revived in 1919.

From the employer's viewpoint evening classes have the advantage of not infringing on working time. For the worker, on the other hand, they may mean fatgue, which is a problem in adult education in general.

Nordic Lands Ask Britain To End Patrols Off Iceland

STOCKHOLM, March 27 (Reuters)—Foreign Ministers of the five Nordic countries have called on Britain to pull its warships out of Icelandic waters to assist a peaceful solution of a fishing dispute.

In a communiqué, the Foreign Ministers of Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark and Iceland expressed deep anxiety about the dispute.

They referred to the vital importance of fishing for Iceland and urged all parties to contribute to the creation of conditions in which a peaceful solution could be achieved.

"The ministers agreed that a withdrawal of the British naval vessels would promote such a solution," the communiqué said.

PORTUGAL LIVES IN UNEASY CALM

In the Land of Shortages the Only Things in Supply Are Uncertainty and Doubt

By HENRY GINIGER
Special to The New York Times

LISBON, March 27—In the almost two years since it made a revolution, Portugal has never been so calm as it is now, but the country seems unable to shed the uneasy feeling that if things can go wrong they will.

It seems as if the revolution itself has been shelved or at least its more raucous aspects considerably quieted. There has not been a mass street demonstration since last November. One vainly twiddles with radio dials to hear a revolutionary song, even the one identified with the spirit of the revolution in April 1974 "Grandola." Management still has difficult relations with anticapitalist-minded worker, but they are apt to be over bread-and-butter issues rather than ideology. The press and broadcasts are restrained to the point of dullness.

But even in this more sober atmosphere, the Portuguese have the jumpy feeling they have had almost from the beginning of the revolution. There is the usual spate of rumors about an impending coup. Nobody seems able to pinpoint the possible source of such a move but with three attempts since the original one. it seems to be taken for granted that somebody is plotting something.

"The Communists accuse the right and the right accuses the Communists," one Portuguese remarked. Neither is supposed to have an interest in elections. After months of calm, a bit of labor agitation has appeared, enough for Mário Soares, the Socialist leader, to proclaim that the future of democracy in Portugal is in danger.

Uncertainty Over Vote

An election is scheduled for April 25 for a National Assembly, supposedly the first step toward civilian rule. Some military people in high places, including President Francisco da Costa Gomes, are accused of being unwilling to step down. This has also fed speculation that the elections may not be held. The idea that voting is a routine part of political life has not yet become ingrained here.

There are also enough negative elements in Portuguese daily life to give some support to the feeling that stable democracy is not yet a sure thing. In Rossio Square, the heart of Lisbon's life, a pedestrian has trouble making his way along the sidewalks. They are jammed with people out of work, most of them lately come to Portugal from Angola and other African cities.

The so-called returnees arrived here in the midst of an economic crisis and therefore have done little more than swell the unemployed ranks until they now total some 500,000 people, or about 16 percent of the labor force. They are all bitter about the decolonization process that forced them to flee and the political parties are making a play for what would essentially be a protest vote.

But the wonder is that the refugees have remained as quiet asthey have. Some of them have started a weekly newspaper full of bitter recrimination, but after demonstrations last summer and early fall when they first began to arrive in large numbers, they have become for the moment a subdued if grim group.

Now things may get a little worse. Because so many have no homes to go to they have been camped, at Government expense, in hotels all over Lisbon, including de luxe establishments. The Government has hopes that tourism, traditionally one of Portugal's biggest money makers, will revive after a bad year, and so wants to move the refuges out of the good hotels. Where they will go is not yet clear.

Shortages of Many Items

For people in general, a new kind of austerity has been added to the inflation they have been contending with for the last four years. Cuts in imports have thinned shelves in the stores. "If you don't get to the butcher before 11 in the morning, there will be no meat," complained one resident. Even fish, notably cod, a staple here, has become a problem. Butter is in short supply. People stand on line to buy potatoes.

So uncertain have the food markets become that a restaurant that opened recently in suburban Cascais calls itself "Whatever There Is."

A spare part for a car will often by hard to come by. Clothing stores that specialized in the latest from Britain, France and Italy now make virtue out of necessity and feature signs in their window displays saying, "Made in Portugal."

With the trade deficit deeply in the red, buying Portuguese is a way of showing patriotism. But fancy grocery dealers are still a bit embarrassed to have to explain they can no longer furnish the biscuits and candies from Britain they once proudly displayed.

Take it easy, relax, everything's going to be fine.

Here's our

Don't Jump-suit

The phrase "Jump-suit" always gives us a vaguely jittery feeling. As if we ought to jump up and do something about something.

If you agree, you'll join us in an energy-saving nod of congratulations to the Hathaway men, who usually make fine-fitting shirts, but have now come up with a fine-fitting one piece number under the name "OtherWear".

We prefer to call it our Don't Jump-suit because, for one thing, you don't jump into it. You step into it, one leg at a time. Then you give a gentle tug to the zipper and you're all dressed. Dressed to do nothing you don't feel like doing. Don't jogging, don't playing paddle ball, don't washing the dog, don't pruning the hedge, don't paving the patio.

If you let your work-ethic conscience relax, you'll come up with your own creative list of don'ts for your Don't Jump-suit,

Of course, Don't Jump can and will do any of the above with ease and comfort. It's cut for action (in case the spirit moves you). But we'd also like to point out that it's built to be extremely easy to sit down in.

Now we don't want to tire you with any more words, so we'll just list a few more of Don't Jump's attributes.

1. Easy care Dacron® polyester and cotton with a poplin texture.
2. Raglan sleeves for easy fit.
3. Top flap pockets have no buttons to pop off.
4. Full zip front (see above).
5. Slanted pockets you can get your hands into when you're standing around doing nothing.
6. Set-in belt goes easy on your waistline.
7. Easy going flared legs.
8. Military sleeve tab looks good, does nothing whatsoever.
9. Relaxing colors: tan or light blue.
10. Sizes s.m.l.xl., 90.00.

And don't rush in to Altman's. Amble, ramble, stroll or saunter over to the new What's Next Shop in our Men's Store and say "Don't Jump, please".

EGYPTIANS SEEK ARMS SUPPLIERS

and air force will be markedly inferior to Israeli forces in Sinai.

This, Egyptian diplomats emphasized, is "not a situation from which we can continue the advance towards peace in the Middle East."

They believe that their country must have a credible defense structure if it is to negotiate further with Israel on territorial claims in Sinai.

China to Supply Engines

The Chinese Government, the Egyptians said, has agreed to provide 30 engines for Egyptian MIG-21's, Egypt has 250 of these aircraft in its inventory and 25 MIG-23's. Officials say that the flow of spare parts for both aircraft has been cut by Moscow.

Yugoslavia, which has 110 MIG-21's, appears to be the most likely source of more spare parts for these aircraft. The Yugoslav arms industry is believed to manufacture many of these parts as part of an effort to remain militarily independent of the Soviet Union.

Earlier Egypt sought spare parts from India, which manufactures MIG-21's. The Indian Government, after initial agreement, turned down the Egyptian request, apparently on direction from Moscow.

To emphasize the country's shift toward the West, the Egyptian Government is expected to ask the Soviet Union to stop using Alexandria as a naval anchorage. Warships based there have been used for the past 10 years to shadow ships of the American Sixth Fleet in the eastern Mediterranean.

Military analysts here believe that Egypt's military position will be further weakened by the withdrawal of more than 200 Soviet technicians who maintain the surface-to-air missile system installed west of The Suez Canal. They also predicted that the few remaining Russians who have overseen maintenance and repair work for the MIG-23 squadron would be called home.

Egypt has already shown an interest in purchasing the French Mirage F-1 as a replacement for her MIG-21's. The Defense Minister, Lieut. Gen. Mohammed Abdel Ghany el-Gamasy, has also expressed interest in French trainer aircraft, air-to-air missiles and helicopters.

The Egyptians also are interested in the British-French Jaguar strike aircraft and in the American F-16 fighter, which is not yet in production. They are aware that it will be difficult to talk about arms, defensive or otherwise, with the United States until after the Presidential election.

American military sources regard the present Egyptian military situation as weak. They note that the shortage of spare parts has resulted in a severe curtailment of flying operations by the Egyptian Air Force and in a reduction in the number of tanks fit for operations.

They also emphasize that the acquisition of new materiel from abroad, if it develops, will not end Egypt's military problems.

Approximately 90 percent of the Egypt's military hardware is of Soviet origin. Pilots, tank crews and missile teams have been trained on Russian weaponry. It will take two or three years, one source familiar with the Egyptian forces said out, to retrain the Egyptians on the variety of new weapons envisaged in the new procurement program.

SADAT URGES DRIVE TO BUILD ECONOMY

CAIRO, March 27 (Reuters)—President Anwar el-Sadat today predicted five more lean years for Egypt and urged his people to copy the Germans after World War II in rebuilding the economy.

"I say that we have five more years of sweat and toil to improve our economy," Mr. Sadat told the Central Committee of the Arab Socialist Union, Egypt's sole political organization.

Mr. Sadat spoke two days before going to West Germany at the start of a tour of five European countries aimed at gathering more economic and military aid.

He reiterated his opposition to any Western-style democracy in Egypt and rebuked the Egyptian press for having blackened the country's image abroad.

British Bartenders Blamed For Violent Youth Crimes

LONDON, March 27 (AP)—Soft-hearted bartenders have been blamed by a British chief constable for violent crimes committed by juveniles because they were unwilling or unable to refuse them a drink.

"The weakness of some barmen, ill-equipped to deal with habitual drunkards and unable or unwilling to refuse drinks to juveniles, must contribute to some extent to alcohol-associated crimes," said Anthony Armstrong, chief constable of Bedfordshire in the English Midlands.

Mr. Armstrong described his ideal bartender as "a physically imposing man, a man who is fairly young, who has a knowledge of the law and who is a responsible person."

Moslem Alliance Gaining in Lebanon

Moslem forces four days ago.

Since then, they moved northward around the curving valley and have reached the highway to the Bekaa Valley, which joins the Damascus road further east.

They now are shelling an area on the mountain ridge to the north. Beyond the ridge is the Kasrawan stretching down to the sea and the port of Junieh, the "capital" of the Maronite area where President Franjieh has taken refuge.

The political consequences of this military drive were evident here today.

A big black car carrying Fuad Lahoud, a Maronite member of Parliament and until recently a staunch defender of Mr. Franjieh drove up unexpectedly.

Mr. Lahoud, who is either of ample girth or was wearing a bullet prood vest under his sweater, stepped out for a chat with the mayor of the village, an old farmer and one of the few villagers who had not fled.

Mr. Lahoud told the mayor that he had come to see the situation in the village and, having seen no destruction, he would advise the villagers to return.

To Ab Abdullah, a young uniformed officer who identified himself as a member of Al Fatah, the largest group within the Palestine Liberation Organization, Mr. Lahoud said that he had received a promise from Mr. Jumblat that the Moslem-leftist forces would not move into the major Christian-inhabited towns in his district.

Mr. Abdullah later said that Mr. Jumblat's decision could be reversed by military necessity.

A Curious Conflict

The exchange reflected the curious character of the civil war, which is part political conflict and part military.

The implication was that the Maronite Christians would be all right if nearby villages dominated by leftist Christians were permitted by the right-wing Christian militia surrounding them to link up with the main territory of the leftist-Moslem alliance.

In Damascus tonight, Mr. Jumblat underlined the importance of this issue in the context of cease-fire negotiations when he charged that the villages were besieged by 40,000 Phalangists who had cut villagers off from their water and ammunition supplies.

The two sides in the Lebanese civil-war are trying to clean up the boundaries between them. Each wants its towns and, in Beirut, its neighborhoods, to be safe from their neighbors.

The New York Times/March 28, 1976
Moslems and leftists are pushing northward after seizing Jiwar al-Hawz.

The makeup of the Moslem-leftist alliance was graphically visible along the mountain roads here today.

There were solidly built older men from the local villages carrying rifles, their heads in black-and-white kaffiyehs of the Arab peasant.

They were young men in army uniforms belonging to the deserter force of the Lebanese Arab Army. One of them wore a crucifix on a chain of beads around his neck.

There were longhaired young Beirut men belonging to the leftwing Independent Nasserites and Communists in blue parkas.

There were equally young and diversely clad men belonging to the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, the Marxist Palestinian group led by George Habash.

And then, essential in the picture, almost everywhere there were soldier-like, quietly efficient looking men in khaki fatigues, belonging to al Patah, headed by Yasir Arafat.

Shelling Is Reported

BEIRUT, Lebanon, March 27 (AP) — Palestinian refugee camps were shelled today and 37 people were killed or wounded, a Palestinian spokesman said.

The refugee spokesman said the camps had apparently been shelled by right-wing Christian forces. He did not identify the camps, nor did he divide the casualty toll into dead and injured.

Moslem gunmen in Beirut, meanwhile, moved into the towering Starco center, for months held by Christian defenders. The occupation of the center further consolidated the Moslem grip on the downtown hotel area.

However, there was a relative easing of fighting after a night of house-to-house combat.

The police said six people were killed, and 11 wounded during the day's street battles, compared with 96 killed and 157 wounded in the hours before dawn.

A police spokesman acknowledged that the authorities were largely guessing at the number of casualties "since we have no real means any more to get into the battle zones."

The relative lull during the day opened the way for widespread looting of areas previously under fire.

"They are bringing in trucks to the harbor and loading up without a moment wasted," said a police source.

Christians Ask Cease-Fire

BEIRUT, March 27 (Reuters) —Christian leaders called today for a cease-fire in the civil war as the right-wing forces backing them battled o defend their sectors.

The cease-fire bid was backed by five leaders of the Maronite sect, including President Suleiman Franjieh.

Data Is Said to Show Nazis Started 1933 Reichstag Fire

HAMBURG, West Germany, March 27 (UPI)—An international committee investigating the causes of World War II has said that it has new and conclusive evidence that the Nazis burned down the Reichstag building in 1933.

A Nazi court ruled that Marinus van de Lubbe, a Dutch Communist, had set the Berlin building on fire.

Heinz Leferenz, the director of the Criminological institute at the University of Heidelberg, said in a report for the International Committee for the Research of the Causes and Consequences of World War II that after questioning persons in East Germany he was convinced that the Nazis were responsible for the blaze.

Mr. Leferenz said that the palace of Reichstag president, Herman Goering, was connected to the building by an underground tunnel.

Mr. Leferenz said that he had questioned a former palace worker, Heinrich Grunewald, who said the arsonists were Nazis lodged in the palace under the pretext of "strengthening the watch."

The Nazis used the Reichstag fire as an excuse to throw thousands of Communists into jail and to consolidate their power.

Soviet Literary Journals Debate Whether Legendary Achilles Was a Forebear of the Russians

March 27—Two ry publications off to trade bare- its over a notion the Greek hero had," might have ly forbear of the e, which unfolded few months, in- iters union week- ya Gazeta, which pathetic to the unost, a monthly ople, which has as nonsense. as enlivened what some Russian intellectuals consider an otherwise ideologically turgid literary scene. Such backbiting in print has been extremely rare since a brief period of creativity under the late Nikita S. Khrushchev.

The issue emerged after a book, "Thoughts About the Russian Word," was published in Moscow last year. Its author, Aleksei K. Yugov, raised the idea in one chapter that Achilles might have been a noble forbear of the Russian people. He contended that Achilles was identified as Scythian in certain medieval chronicles and reported that a distinguished 19th century Russian scholar, Vasily G. Vasilevsky, had supported the hypothesis.

A Nationalist View

The idea fits in enticingly enough with the nationalist view of Russia as a dominant historical force. The Scythians, were a generally nomadic people who once inhabited what are now parts of the Soviet Union. Some of their gold artifacts, exhibited in the United States last year, were made by hired Greek artisans, though a more substantial blood relationship remains tenuous.

But last December, Yunost ridiculed the proposal in a satirical piece signed Galka Galkina, the pen name for a popeyed, waiflike caricature used to speak for Yunost's editors.

Yunost wondered whether Mr. Yugov "really believes that the Russian soil is so poor in its own heroes and must urgently borrow them from other peoples." It said that Mr. Yugov had constructed his case on such flimsy evidence as an observation that Achilles, according to Homer, brought 1,000 warriors in 50 boats to Troy, or 20 in each boat, and that ancient Russian boats had also carried 20 warriors.

Galka Galkina concluded that while Homer's hero "had only one Achilles heel a Yugov has many more of them."

Flippancy Deplored

This brought a scolding the following month from Literaturnaya Gazeta. In a column signed Man of Letters, the weekly called the theory of a Russian Achilles a legitimate subject for exploration. While it insisted it was not taking sides, Literaturnaya Gazeta deplored the flippancy of Yunost and noted that knowledge would never have developed if such "daring suppositions" had been stifled so quickly.

The weekly also reported that the late Mr. Vasilevsky "in particular" had espoused such a view. Aiming lower, Literaturnaya Gazeta observed that "Galka" in Russian meant a jackdaw or small crow, which filled its habitat with "noise and clamor."

Yunost struck back in its current issue, just released. It reprinted the entire Literaturnaya Gazeta article for its readers so they could judge for themselves the "learned dispute between 'Galka Galkina,' and the esteemed 'Man of Letters' " and added a flip defense of the jackdaw.

But more devastating, it printed alongside a scholarly statement signed by two well-known members of the Academy of Sciences, Mikhail Alekseyev and Dmitri S. Likhachev, and seven other doctors of sciences seven others specializing in literature and history. The nine wrote that "Vasilevsky not only never voiced such an opinion but undoubtedly would have considered it ignorance," and likened the resurrection of such medieval speculation about Achilles to a defense of alchemy.

Russians are waiting to see whether Literaturnaya Gazeta, its credibility challenged, will try for the final word. Some friction occurred between the two publications last summer. Yunost's editor emeritus, Valentin V. Katayev, related in a light reminiscence how an unnamed rival editor "with a hypocritical smile" had warned him against publishing Hemingway's "Old Man and the Sea" as ideologically risky and then snapped it up himself.

Anti-Soviet Violence Here Upsets Jews in Moscow

By CHRISTOPHER S. WREN
Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, March 27—The harassment of Soviet officials by Jewish militants in New York has upset not only Soviet authorities but also some Soviet Jews on whose behalf the actions have allegedly been conducted.

The Soviet press, which until recently was relatively low-keyed in reporting each "provocation," has taken a stronger line, charging today that American law enforcement authorities were encouraging the "fascistic hooligans."

For average Russians, the actions confirm the Kremlin's ideological contention that the United States is dominated by violence. The man in the street here tends to take insults to Soviet diplomats abroad personally.

A number of Jewish activists refused permission to emigrate here feel that such harassment in New York hurts their cause and may give Soviet authorities an excuse to become even more intransigent.

70 Calls to Americans

However, the Jews reject as "ridiculous" the notion that retaliatory threats against American diplomats in Moscow recently were not orchestrated by Soviet authorities. "In New York, anyone can call up the Soviet mission and say what he likes. But here no one is supposed to know the number of the American Embassy," said a Jewish scientist.

For two nights and a day earlier this week, 23 American diplomats received about 70 phone calls from Soviet "citizens" warning that the diplomats were vulnerable to the same treatment Soviet officials were getting in New York. American diplomats believe the threats which have stopped, had official sanction.

"I think they're getting quite concerned here about the developments in New York," one diplomat said. He observed that "if this kind of thing goes on, it can have an effect on the over-all relationship" at a time when Soviet-American accommodation is already under a strain.

Though a bomb hoax briefly forced the evacuation of two American Embassy floors on Thursday, there has been no vandalism of diplomats' cars yet as happened in a similar war of nerves five years ago. Both countries have formally protested the mistreatment of their officials.

The tougher line in the Soviet press recently has prompted speculation that harassment of American diplomats could be resumed if the militants in New York were not restrained.

Today, the press agency Tass reported that the "Zionists" had "abandoned threats for acts of terrorism" and referred to the bomb found Thursday at Amtorg, the Soviet trade organization.

Tass also alleged that members of the Jewish Defense League and "similar gangs rioted" for several hours yesterday in front of the Aeroflot office in New York while police watched passively.

"The escalation of Zionist violence is the direct result of the inaction of American authorities, who actually encourage the terror and lawlessness of the fascistic criminals," Tass said.

Some Jews waiting for exit visas here are unhappy over the violent tactics, which have included shooting into a Soviet apartment building, bombing the Aeroflot office and intimidating Soviet diplomats.

"I find it petty and I don't approve of it," one woman said. "It doesn't help us. Help must be performed on a much higher level."

"If something is bad in one part of the world, it shouldn't be repeated somewhere else," her husband added. "They might have sympathy for us, but I don't like it. I don't like any kind of violence."

Another Jewish activist feared that such actions could make authorities more unwilling to relax emigration policies for fear of losing face.

gates Doodle as a Procedural Details Slow Down Progress at the U.N.'s Law of the Sea Conference

LEEN TELTSCH

NATIONS, N. Y., -The 1,200 partici- n 156 countries r a future treaty es of the oceans ubed seem at the vo weeks to be against a common sdom.

s too much nit- omplained a Scan- aval officer after a committee spent two days haggling over the wording of a single treaty article.

There are 407 articles in the tentative text covering all aspects of sea law, including shipping and fishing rights, coastal nations' control of offshore resources, issues involving scientific research and pollution, and proposals for new machinery for the exploration and exploitation of the mineral wealth of the deep seabed.

The snail's pace leaves many negotiators grumbling, doodling on their documents or roaming restlessly around the crowded meeting rooms.

A number of delegation leaders—Karl Herman Knoke of West Germany is one—are openly expressing doubts that 1976 will see agreement reached on a treaty to be signed next year, although he agrees it is too early in the current session to make firm judgments.

The sheer dimensions of the undertaking and the complexity of issues—not lack of will—have slowed the negotiations, according to Hamilton Shirley Amerasinghe of Sri Lanka, the president of the Law of the Sea Conference.

He insists that there is a better spirit of cooperation than was evident last year during negotiations at Geneva and that one more round of meetings later this year should see an agreement wrapped up.

The strategy behind the single text is to allow margin for bargaining. A powerful seafaring country, in exchange for guarantees about passage through straits, would be expected to be more amenable to the poorer nations' demands for a more equitable sharing of the ocean resources.

"The treaty has to be concocted like a paella to satisfy all tastes," says Bernardo Zuleta, the Colombian diplomat who serves as secretary general of the conference. "One prepares the seafood, the meat, the chicken and the rice, but they are just an assortment of separate dishes until they are blended into perfect unity and the result is paella—or a treaty for all."

The contentious issue remains the proposed new international authority to decide on the exploitation of the mineral wealth of the deep seabed, including the metal-bearing nodules of the ocean floor whose estimated value is three trillion dollars.

The negotiations have been assigned to a committee headed by Paul Engo, a diplomat and jurist from the Cameroon who was a 1956 Olympic star in the hop, skip and jump. These days Mr. Engo in his dashiki appropriately printed with fish symbols rushes about as if his own speed could hasten the lagging progress of his committee.

Peking's Drive Against 'Rightists' Is Said to Shift Into More Moderate P

tone and scope of the campaign mean it will eventually fade away, as other movements have in recent years, is unclear.

The fate of Mr. Teng, who was earlier purged in the Cultural Revolution as a "capitalist roader," is also uncertain. An official at Tsinghua University in Peking told foreign diplomats yesterday that Mr. Teng still held his posts as Deputy Prime Minister, chief-of-staff of the army, and deputy chairman of the party. But the official added, "He is already deserted by his supporters."

An article in Jenmin Jih Pao earlier this week indicated that Mr. Teng's future might depend on whether he was willing to recant his errors, a development analysts considered unlikely, given Mr. Teng's tough, sometimes abrasive, personality. "The people are now waiting to see whether that capitalist roader bent on reversing correct verdicts [the usual allusion to Mr. Teng] can change his bourgeois-class stand or whether he will continue to play tricks."

Word Sent Out

As the campaign has moderated in the last two weeks there have been almost no new charges against Mr. Teng in the press, a sharp contrast to the nearly daily escalation of the campaign's attacks in February. And intelligence specialists report that Peking has finally begun to send out explanatory directives on the campaign to the provinces. These are said to reassure the local leaders that the campaign is a general one designed to prevent backsliding toward revisionism and that no "fighting groups" are to be organized, as they were during the Cultural Revolution.

Analysts believe the issuing of the directives indicates that party leaders must have reached some agreement on the purposes of the campaign. For when it first broke out in February local officials, Communists here in Hong Kong as well as in Peking were reportedly caught by surprise and for several weeks had no official guidance from party headquarters.

The first public indication that moderate leaders in the party, who would normally be expected to side with Mr. Teng, d recovered from their apparent initial disarray and were reasserting some measure of authority, came with an editorial in Jenmin Jih Pao on March 10. The first and so far only official party statement on the campaign, it contained a call for study and cited a quotation from Chairman Mao Tse-tung on the need to "help people by educating them and narrow the target of attack."

Moderates' Leader Unknown

With Mr. Teng under attack and Mr. Chou dead, it is not Lnown who if anybody may be leading the moderates, who have stood for orderly economic development as opposed to Chairman Mao's concern to preserve China's revolutionary purity. One possibility . advanced by some analysts is that Chu Teh, the venerable 90-year-old marshal and heai of the National People's Congress, may be playing some role.

A poem Mr. Chu recently composed after reading two new verses by Chairman Mao published on New Year's Day contains what seems to be a veiled criticism of the current campaign. "!! Mr. Chu's poem was the lead item in a new Chinese poetry magazine, but it has not been reprinted in Jenmin Jih Pao, though most of the other verses in the magazine by lesser known authors have been.

In the poem, Mr. Chu recalled how large numbers of people, perhaps including Mr. Teng, had helped Chairman Mao begin the revolution. And in an allusion to an often-quoted line in the Chairman's verse, about daring to scale the heights, Mr. Chu added:

"We dare to scale the dangerous heights if the whole party is united closely."

Stree Stress on Study

Some of the clearest evidence that the antirightist campaign has shifted into a less vitriolic mode comes in the articles calling for study, which usually alternates with "struggle" in Chinese Communist parlance to mark different phases of action.

The Jenmin Jih Pao article this week suggested that "We must put study into first place and study Chairman Mao's series of important instructions in an extremely serious way, in guided an planned fashion and step by step."

Perhaps to justify this new emphasis on study, the author charges that Mr. Teng had tried to block an order by Chairman Mao last year to study the theory of the dictatorship of the proletariat. "... speeches," the w "There are very about study, and e or two sentences it are only a cover-u

Vote Increases Gandhi Majority To Two-Thirds in Upper House

Special to The New York Times

NEW DELHI, March 27—Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's Congress Party regained its two-thirds majority in the upper house of Parliament today, thus giving her the long-needed legislative support to push through constitutional changes.

In the nationwide elections held today among state legislators for a third of the 244-member house, her party wrested 18 seats from the opposition. This raised the party strength to 164, from 146.

The party lost power in a states in the 1967 elections held a year after Mrs. Gandhi became Prime Minister. At that time her party's strength was also reduced to a simple majority in the lower house ofParliament. Two years later her party lost its lower-house majority when old-guard members of her party broke with her.

Party strength also declined in the upper house. Until 1971, when Mrs. Gandhi scored a sweeping election victory and regained dominance in the lower house, she had to depend on support from the pro-Moscow Communist Party and regional parties for survival.

The lack of strong support in the upper house, interfered with Mrs. Gandhi's plans for constitutional amendments. Measures passed by the lower house would fail to get past the upper house because they required a two-thirds vote in each house.

Bank nationalization and abolition of privileges to the princes who ruled regions prior to undependence were two notable constitutional changes that initially floundered in the upper house but later were approved with the support of leftist groups.

As a result of today's elections Mrs. Gandhi has freed herself of dependence of smaller groups and is in a position to push through all the constitutional reforms she has in mind.

Since the June declaration of emergency that curtailed civil liberties, Mrs? Gandhi has been planning amendments to consolidate her authoritarian role and to legistate far-reaching social and political changes that were not possible under the 1950 Constitution.

Utility in Georgia Decides To Hire Its Own Mailmen

ATLANTA, March 27 (AP)—The Georgia Power Company has decided that its own mailmen can deliver monthly bills cheaper than those of the United States Postal Service.

Officials say the utility will hire about 30 full-time employees to begin hand-delivering bills in the Atlanta area in May, and later use private mail couriers in Augusta, Columbus, Macon, Athens, Rome and Valdosta.

Rising postage rates and the company's decision to change from 9-cent postcard bills to 13-cent letters make it cheaper to hand-deliver than to send bills by mail, according to Thomas C. Wells Jr., vice president and treasurer.

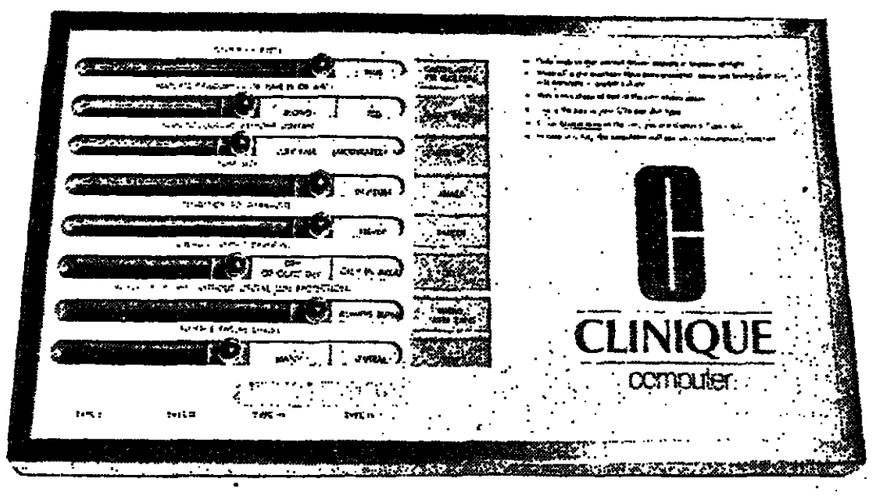
We can predict your future and read your mind



Prediction I. Something happy will happen to you tomorrow.
And you won't have to cross anyone's palm with silver. You'll just stroll into our Clinique boutique, settle down on one of those soft white chairs, and have a good heart-to-heart with the Clinique seer.

Prediction II. Before you leave our store, you'll learn something surprising about yourself.

Prediction III. You'll walk away smiling, because the news you hear will be good news.

Okay, here's where we read your mind. Right now, you're saying to yourself "Uh-oh. I never thought Altman's would go bonkers." And to that we answer "Have we ever yet led you down the primrose path?"

You see, nobody here will read tea leaves or gaze into a crystal ball. This is all so scientific that a carefully trained expert will use the Clinique computer to gather very personal data about you.

She'll ask you eight questions. Nothing mystical. All interesting. Like: what color was your hair when you were five? Do you sun-burn easily? Then she'll study your skin very carefully, consult the computer once more, and tell you straight out what three simple things you can do to improve your skin. That is, look better. And (it must follow as the night the day) feel happier.

There's no hocus-pocus about the three simple steps you'll take to save your skin tone, either. A team of well known dermatologists formulated the Clinique program after years of experience and research. So, of course, everything's pure as science can make it: allergy-tested and fragrance-free.

Prediction IV. Your Clinique consultant will recommend (A) Soap, (B) Clarifying lotion, (C) Lubrication.

Always? Yes always. But, she'll tell you exactly which soap, which lotion, which lubricant is right for your special skin type. And how to use each one.

Prediction V. After you've followed your personal three-minutes, twice-a-day Clinique regime for a few weeks, you'll say "I never knew my skin could look this good."

One more prediction: you'll have a happy surprise every time you come to Altman's.
We're a most surprising store.

Peru Ousts 6 Major Editors In Apparent Move on Far Left

LIMA, Peru, March 27 (Reuters)—Peru's military Government has dismissed the editors of six national newspapers and told their replacements to print more balanced and less alarmist news.

The immediate effect of the action has been a marked reduction in reporting of Communist-supported strike calls and an easing of extreme left-wing views.

The new editors were appointed to run the Government newspaper La Crónica and five of the six national dailies, which were expropriated from private owners by former President Juan Velasco Alvarado.

Peru's Government has also imposed controls that could prevent newsmen from opening any new publication.

Labor contracts in all newspapers have been suspended for 90 days, but the editors who took over on March 15 say they do not plan large-scale dismissals.

The new editors replaced a group of left-wing intellectuals who were appointed by General Velasco before he was ousted last August in a peaceful coup led by President Francisco Morales Bermúdez.

Only Cesar Miro, named editor of Ojo earlier this month, survived the purge.

"We're going to give a more balanced view of things," the new editor of Expreso, Juan José Vega, said.

Mr. Jose Vega, a history professor and former newsman, scrapped Expreso's extreme left-wing political column as soon as he became editor.

Four political writers on Correo, which printed left-wing comment, resigned when the new editor, Atenor del Pozo, took over.

The pro-Communist weekly magazine Marka described the appointments as a move to the right.

Employees of the newspapers have petitioned the Government to open talks on the future of the national press.

"Apart from being worried that we may lose our jobs until the 90-day period is up, many of us are concerned about the future of the newspapers," one newsman said.

3 Leftist Guerrillas, 2 Security Guards Killed in Argentina

Special to The New York Times

BUENOS AIRES, March 27—Five persons—three left-wing guerrillas and two security guards of a Ford Motor Company engineer—were killed in separate incidents of political violence, security forces announced today.

The three guerrillas were killed by the police in a residential suburb of Córdoba when security forces raided a suspected underground printing plant and were met by gunfire.

The two security guards at the home of the Ford executive in Hurlingham, a residential suburb of Buenos Aires, were killed by gunfire from a car, which then sped away.

There have been scores of such hit-and-run attacks by terrorists against executives of foreign companies, most of whom have bodyguards at their homes who accompany them to and from work.

Four left-wing guerrillas were killed yesterday at a roadblock outside Córdoba, and one was identified by the police today as Andres Osatinsky, the brother of Marcos Osatinsky, a leader of the Peronist Montoneros guerrilla organization, who was killed after being arrested by the Córdoba police last year.

The new military junta that overthrew President Isabel Martínez de Perón this week has established special military courts to try extremists, who can be sentenced to death for attacking military personnel.

F.C.C. to Seek Outside Aid On Citizen Bands Radio Rise

WASHINGTON, March 27 (AP)—The Federal Communications Commission announced yesterday plans to create an outside advisory committee to help it cope with the problems created by the citizens' band radio expansion.

The sale of citizens' band radios increased from 300,000 in 1974 to 1.1 million in 1975 and is expected to reach 3.8 million this year.

This has caused an F.C.C. backlog of applications for licenses and increased the problems of overpowered transmitters, unlicensed operators and crowding of the 23 channels now available.

The commission is expected to announce next week the details of its plans to permit temporary licenses that can be obtained when a set is purchased and will be good for 60 days after it is mailed.

It is also studying how to expand the number of channels to at least 99 when the industry solves the problems of interference created by citizens' band sets when there are more than 40 channels.

Board, set up to tell the nation how to think in metric terms, admits a gradual changeover begun in 1965 is "running several years late."

Bill Signed by Ford

In Washington, President Ford declared the United States "an island in a metric sea" and signed a bill last December making increased use of the metric system a national policy and creating a Metric Board to oversee voluntary conversion. Several American states have enacted laws on education in the metric system, which is widely used in industry and commerce.

In Britain, a score of Labor legislators told the Government privately that they would not vote for the measures bill. Many of them opposed Britain's entry into the European Common Market, which in 1971 ordered all members to go metric within seven years.

Opposition Conservatives, who also plan to vote against the bill, accuse the Government of failing to provide information on conversion dates and consumer safeguards against price increases. The bill's opponents would prefer voluntary instead of compulsory conversion.

More than half of Britain's engineering output is now metric, the construction industry is almost completely metric and food processing and the clothing industry are changing over. But metrication is in trouble in stores and shops. Many Britons trace the current inflation to the decimalization of the currency in 1969.

The Metrication Board has spent about $3 million in the last seven years to tell the nation how easy the system is. The effort includes posters depicting the different metric measures and bearing rhymes, among them:

Rocket Launchings Set for Exploration Of Aurora Borealis

WASHINGTON, March 27 (AP)—Scientists are set to fire spiny, porcupine-looking instruments into the northern lights in an international effort to find out how the aurora borealis is produced.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration said Tuesday that two single-stage sounding rockets would be launched from northern Sweden before April 4.

The 550-pound instrument packages, the largest believed carried by a sounding rocket, are to reach 300 miles above earth on 12-minute ballistic flights and splash down in the Arctic Ocean 285 miles from the launching site.

The packages developed by the United States and West Germany will be the first flown on the new Aries rocket. Aries are modified versions of obsolete upper stages of Minuteman intercontinental ballistic missiles provided by the United States Air Force.

The rocket payload in the German-United States study, known as Project Porcupine, has 12 quill-like booms extending from it. These extensions are to gather data for 11 experiments probing the aurora and the electrical and magnetic disturbance beyond.

As each rocket reaches about 60 miles in altitude, it will eject two smaller probes carrying complementary instruments.

At 280 miles, each rocket is to explode two canisters of barium. The barium clouds, which will be photographed from aircraft and the ground, should show magnetic field lines and the drift of the charged particles making up the aurora.

A second pair of Project Porcupine rockets will be flown in 1977. The project is part of the 1976-78 International Magnetospheric Study, a 40-nation effort to explore the upper atmosphere.

Ford Hints Acceptance For Reagan on Ticket

SAN FRANCISCO, March 26 (UPI)—President Ford indicated Friday that Ronald Reagan might be acceptable as his Republican Vice-Presidential running mate.

Asked by reporters on his arrival from Washington if he would consider his rival for the Presidential nomination as a running mate, Mr. Ford said there were numerous Republicans with "fine, fine" qualities suiting them for the Vice-Presidential nomination.

He added that Mr. Reagan shared "in many of the qualities.

Italy Confiscating Ransoms to Deter Kidnappers

By ALVIN SHUSTER
Special to The New York Times

ROME, March 27—The Italian police have decided to try a new weapon to thwart kidnapping—they are confiscating the ransom money gathered by the victim's relatives.

They are not having much luck finding the kidnappers so they are spending their time trying to find the ransoms before the money can be turned over. The change of tactics has stirred a controversy, with several lawyers suggesting that families of kidnap victims would now hesitate to report the crimes to the police.

In Milan Tuesday, the police confiscated the equivalent of $200,000 as the brother-in-law of a kidnap victim emerged from a local bank with the money in a leather bag. They said it represented the last installment in the ransom of $1.2 million for Alberto Villa, a kidnapped poultry dealer.

Last week, the police in Milan raided the office of an attorney and seized the equivalent of nearly $500,000 raised by the family of Carlo Alberghini, a kidnapped industrialist. The kidnappers were then reported to have ended all communications with the family.

The police justify their change of tactics by pointing out that the criminal code says they are charged with preventing a crime "whose design has become known, from being perfected." One possible result would be to charge the relatives of victims with aiding a crime by raising the ransom money.

Francesco Cossiga, the Minister of the Interior, defended the seizure of ransom money, saying the police would use all "legal means" to stop the rash of kidnappings. He said that the nation "cannot abdicate its duty to prevent crime" and added that the payment of ransom did not guarantee the survival of the victim.

Some lawyers said, however, that the new procedure would not only deter relatives from reporting the crimes but would also make it more difficult to discover the kidnappers. Several members of the families of the victims whose ransoms were seized also objected.

GOV. MILLIKEN SIGNS BILL CURBING PCB'S

Special to The New York Times

LANSING, Mich., March 27—Legislation banning in Michigan the manufacture and sale of polychlorinated biphenyls, the toxic industrial chemical, and sharply restricting their use was signed into law this week by Gov. William G. Milliken.

PCB's are a major worldwide pollution problem. They are used extensively in electrical equipment, hydraulic and heat transfer systems and in wax castings used by the auto industry.

The Michigan law allows PCB's only in electric insulators and capacitors and requires that these uses by phased out once the State Department of Natural Resources determines that a satisfactory substitute exists. The law allows adoption of administrative rules to make related chemical compounds subject to the statute.

The ban on uses of the chemical will be phased in over the next two years.

Michigan officials have warned citizens not to eat more than one meal a week of trout caught in the Great Lakes because of high levels of PCB's in fish flesh. Lake trout with as many as 160 parts a million of the chemical have been caught in Lake Michigan.

Y STALLS BANK BILL

ek to Include ted-Lining

SMOTHERS
New York Times

urch 27 — The o allow savings tinue checking least temporar- as a group of emblymen move with a require- s create a "sub-stantial" fund for socalled high-risk mortgage loans.

A bill without such a requirement had the support of the Assembly leadership and was to be considered last Wednesday, but action was postponed until next Monday by the Democratic leaders when opposition emerged.

It was unclear what real possibility the bill's opponents had of winning their point, but htose chances were buoyed a bit when Assembly Speaker Stanley Steingut, Democrat of Brooklyn, reportedly decided to "adopt a hands-off policy for now" in the dispute.

"There might be some question about whether there are enough votes to pass a measure without the requirement to set up a fund," said a spokesman for Mr. Steingut, adding that the bill might not be considered Monday as scheduled. For the time being, he said, the Speaker's office was not involved in any efforts to resolve the differences.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the Savings Bank Association of New York State said that the group was not prepared to negotiate with legislators on the creation of such a fund "until after the checking-account bill passes." The Republican Senate leadership, aware of the Democratic infighting in the Assembly, will not act on a checking account bill, a spokesman said, until the Assembly resolves its problems.

Savings banks are under court order to terminate by May 31 165,000 checking or "Now accounts" they have maintained si nce 1974 unless they get legislation authorizing such accounts. Last year Democrats approved such legislation as part of their legislative program, but linked it to the creation of a high-risk mortgage loan fund by the banks.

Such a fund was designed to halt the practice of red-lining, in which banks allegedly refuse to make mortgage loans in certain neighborhoods—a practice that is said to speed deterioration of racially integrated communities. But the Senate opposed such a condition and defeated the bill.

This year, the State Banking Superintendent, John G. Heimann, proposed a measure to continue the privileges without the condition of creating a loan fund. He noted that the issue of the Now accounts and red-lining were two separate issues and he vowed that the state would deal with each "separately and in good faith."

Governor Carey and Mr. Heimann have required that banks disclose the geographic location of their mortgage loans as a first step to developing legislation to end red-lining.

"We are arguing that this is a Democratic position," said an aide to Assemblyman Arthur O. Evo, Democrat of Buffalo, one of the opponents of the Heimann proposal. "Last year we began this drive against red-lining and the public view of us as Democrats would be damaged if we went with a bill that had none of the things we wanted."

The aide said that Mr. Evo—chairman of the Black and Puerto Rican Caucus—did not want a requirement in the bill to set up such a fund, but wanted a voluntary commitment from the banks to increase a $50 million mortgage review fund set up in November to grant high-risk loans. Mr. Evo would like to see the savings bank commitment increased to $100 million and the involvement of other financial institutions in a $500 million total fund controlled by representatives of banks and

However, Assemblyman Oliver Koppell of the Bronx, the chairman of a small grouP of liberal Democrats called the Democratic Study Group, said that the voluntary effort would not be sufficient and that it should be a requirement in the

"As far as o'lcmd er,e bill.

"As far as I'm concerned, the checking-account privileges go with our atteNPts to end red-lining and to keep the savings banks from exPorting their depositors' money to other states," Mr. Koppell said.

Mr. Eve said that he would not push such a requirement in the bill because it was clear the Senate would reject it as it did last year. Mr. Koppell said he for one, was prepared to test the Senate's stand.

l Louis Costiglio, a spokesman for the Savings Bank Association of

New York :tate, said that the op onents were trying to hold the checking account measure —"a sound consumer device"— as "hostage." He said that the association had agreed to a requirement to set up such a mortgage fund last year, but that 11 things had changed materially since then with the heavy savings bank involvement in the plans to bail out New York City and the state construction agencies."

CELL SPECIMENS ALLEGEDLY SOLD

month as professor of medical microbiology at Stanford University. A news release from the university dated Feb. 27 said the resignation had stemmed from "a dispute between the 48-year-old scholar and the university over management of certain university research contracts."

"Stanford was concerned that its laboratories were inappropriately used in the performance of a contract to store, produce and distribute a strain of human cells, some of which Hayflick sold on his own behalf," the release said.

It quoted the scientist as maintaining that he managed the contract in compliance with university and N.I.H. contract guidelines.

The cells in question are of a widely used strain called WI-38, which Dr. Hayflick and his research team developed for laboratory use more than a decade ago under Government grants and contracts. The original cells came from normal human embryonic tissue.

Cells derived from that original specimen have since been used throughout the world for many types of studies including virus research, cancer research and investigations of the biology of human aging. In recent years they have also been used in the production of many types of vaccines.

'National Resource'

yesterday described the original stocks as a national resource. They have been kept at Stanford by Dr. Hayflick since 1968.

"This cell strain is the most highly characterized and widely used normal human cell strain in the world," said the N.I.H. investigator's report. "It is the prototype cultured normal human cell and is an important resource."

The cell strain was developed in the early 1960's at Wistar Institute of Anatomy and Biology in Philadelphia, where Dr. Hayflick was on the scientific staff. He moved to Stanford in 1968.

The investigator's report includes a letter indicating that Dr. Hayflick was party to an agreement in early 1968 that the bulk of the basic WI-38 cell stocks would be turned over to a national repository called the American Type Culture Collection and would be the property of the National Cancer Institute, a unit of the N.I.H. Ten ampules of the basic stocks were to be kept by Dr. Hayflick for his own research uses and a like amount was to be kept at Wistar Institute.

Instead, the report said, Dr. Hayflick took 379 ampules of these stocks to Stanford, and at least 207 ampules are now unaccounted for.

There is no indication in the report that the Government made no effort from 1968 to 1975 to recover the cell stocks.

Dr. Hayflick's affidavit said everything he had done with the cells had been done openly, and, to his knowledge, in conformance with Government rules. This included the sale of some WI-38 cells.

The affidavit said the investigation started from an inquiry Dr. Hayflick made to the institutes to get some clarification of issues concerning the cells.

The N.I.H. report said the investigation was begun last year to explore a possible conflict of interest between Dr. Hayflick's activities as president of a company dealing in WI-38 cells and the post of director of the National Institute of Aging, for which he was then being considered.

Stocks Are Frozen

The WI-38 cell stocks are kept in ampules frozen in liquid nitrogen. Speciments are thawed and alowed the reproduce when neded. ons of cels could be grown from the original frozen stocks.

Descendants of the cells still in frezers are being used throughout the world, but each specimen of cells is like a clock that will inevitably run down and can never be rewound. Inded, Dr. Hayflick is credited with the discovery that normal human cells grown in laboratory flasks will divide and reproduce only 50 times, then wil die out. In that respect, the original stocks of the cel line are irreplaceable.

Some confusion appears to have arisen over the questicn of which "passage" of cells was represented in a specimens disposed of by Dr. Hayflick. A passage in this context means a growth and doubling in cell population.

The material to have been sent to the respository was eight-passage cells. In other words, they were cells of the eighth population doubling after the original embryonic cells were harvested and grown. Passages later than the eighth were presumably less significant than basic stocks, and the sale of cells derived from later passages would not have raised questions concerning the ownership of the cells.

Also in dispute between the scientist and the N.I.H. are the fees he charged for tests concerning microorganisms called mycoplasma in connection with cell biology research. A related N.I.H. report recommends that about $9,000 be recovered from fees the scientist collected for such testing.

The report contended that Dr. Hayflick had charged the costs of the testing to N.I.H. research agreements and deposited the fees he received in his private bank accounts.

TOWN MEETINGS THRIVE IN CAPITAL

Weekly Debates Draw Big Kennedy Center Audience

By BARBARA GAMAREKIAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 27—The tousled head of Henry Steele Commager, the historian, and the clipped bangs of author-diplomat Clare Boothe Luce bent cosity together as they shared coffee and conversation on a blue damask loveseat in the Green Room of the Kennedy Center. Their animated exchange on "national sovereignty" was in preparation for their appearance that morning before the weekly Wednesday session of the National Town Meeting in the Eisenhower Theater—and an audience that filled all 1,100 seats and stood four-deep at the rear of the house.

At a small table placed in what could have been a Victorian stage setting and with a precision of language, verve and humor—acerbic on Mrs. Luce's part—gentle on Dr. Commager's part—they explored with Martin Agronsky, the moderator, the subject, "America in its Third Century: What Prospects?"

The National Town Meetings, supported by a grant from the Mobil Oil Corporation, are free to the general public and broadcast live over public radio. They are put together by Fred Dutton, a lawyer and a former Government official; Christine Gatewood, and Rosemary Mullaney, who explains, "Fred is executivedirector, I am associate director and Chris is assistant director."

Politics to Philosophy

Discussion subjects can from politics, economics, energy and environmental questions to social and philosophical issues. Participants have included members of Congress, economists, journalists, feminists, scholars and Cabinet members. The audience, which averages a thousand or more, is permitted to ask questions from the floor after the panelists have made brief opening statements and debate at times is heated.

One of the most volatile programs was a debate on women's rights between former Representative Martha W. Griffiths, Democrat of Michigan, and Phyllis Schlafly, well known for her opposition to the equal rights amendment. "If we had had five minutes more, they would have killed each other," said Rosemary Mullaney.

An effort is made to present balanced panels that represent a broad spectrum of political and social thought.

"Liberals are no problem — apparently they like to talk," observed Fred Dutton, "but getting attractive, interesting conservatives seems to be tougher." Irving Kristol was reached a half-dozen times before he agreed to appear on a panel scheduled for next June with Margaret Mead, the anthropologist.

Reflections by Breslin

"Jimmy Breslin told me that if he had had his wits about him, he would have been a conservative," said Mrs. Mullaney. She added, "They must be making a fortune—they are so few and far between."

When members of the audience were recently surveyed on what subjects they would like to have discussed, strong interest was expressed in a program of the arts, and a panel was pulled together made up of the choreographer, Harold Prince, the producer and J. Carter Brown, director of the National Gallery of Art.

Audiences appear to be less interested in orthodox political issues like economics or the military budget, said Mr. Dutton. "Politicians are still talking about what they got excited about 20 years ago, but the public is moving on to issues and concerns which are more personal. The energy level picks up sharply—you can sense it—when the subject under discussion is life styles, marriages, education, or the quality of life."

Twenty-five hundred people turned out to hear Masters and Johnson discuss "Changing Human Relationships."

'Sex Pulls Them In'

"Sex always pulls them in," observed Miss Gatewood with a grin. One Kennedy Center usher said she gave up her $12 ushering fee so that she could sit in the audience for that one.

The same team of ushers work each week. They are critics as well. Among their observations are the following:

¶"We thought the one on 'right of privacy' was going to be dull—but just to have Bella and Barry [Representative Bella S. Abzug and Senator Barry Goldwater] on the same side of the fence made it fun."

¶"George Wills is so marvelous it doesn't matter if you agree with him or not."

¶"Schlafly came on in a cold icy-blue dress—like the president of the Women's Club—but when someone challenged her—she flew all apart."

The first National Town Meeting was aired on June 12, 1974, with then Senator Sam J. Ervin Jr., Democrat of North Carolina, and Patrick Murphy, president of the Police Foundation, discussing, "liberty and law enforcement."

WITNESS RECANTS IN RACIAL KILLING

Late Development Raises Hopes of 17-Year-Old

By ROY REED
Special to The New York Times

NEW ORLEANS, March 27—The repudiation of her testimony by a key witness in a racial killing trial in a nearby Mississippi River town has raised the hopes of a black high school student who is waiting to die in Louisiana's electric chair May 1.

The dramatic late development and a motion for a new trial has revived interest in civil rights activities in the New Orleans area for the first time in several years.

The case had already focused attention on this state's capital punishment law, one of five such state laws that will be studied by the Supreme Court in a hearing next week.

Gary Tyler, now 17 years old, has been on Death Row at the state penitentiary at Angola since December. He was convicted in November of first-degree murder, which, under a new Louisiana law, carries a mandatory death sentence under certain conditions.

An all-white jury selected in an area that is more than 25 percent black found that he had fired the pistol that killed a 13-year-old white student, Timothy Joseph Weber. The killing occurred during a racial flare-up at Destrehan, an industrial suburb 20 miles west of here, on Oct. 7, 1974.

A Key Witness

A key witness at the trial was Natalie Blanks, another black student who was on a school bus with Gary Tyler. She testified that she saw his hand protruding from a bus window holding a pistol after the shot was fired.

Miss Blanks went to the youth's mother a few weeks ago and told her that she had lied on the witness stand, that actually she had not seen anything happen on the bus and that she had testified falsely because the prosecuting attorneys had threatened to charge her with perjury and with being an accessory to murder if she did not.

Mrs. Tyler and the girl went to Jack Peebles of New Orleans, her son's white lawyer—hired to replace another white lawyer after the conviction—and the girl's statement was recorded in a sworn affidavit.

"When I got over to court," she said in the affidavit, "they [the prosecutors] gave me a paper and told me that I had to read it. And I didn't say that, you know. Like, that wasn't my version. That was their version, what was on the paper. They wrote something down on the paper and they told me when I got on the stand to read it. You know, so I read it, and it wasn't the truth."

Comment by Prosecutor

Norman Pitre, the senior assistant district attorney for St. Charles Parish (county) who was one of two prosecutors at the trial, declined to discuss the case Thursday. But he said in regard to Miss Blanks's assertion that she had read from a "paper" on the witness stand, "Do you think any judge in the country would allow his court to be run like that?"

Mr. Pitre and the other prosecutor are expected to be witnesses in a hearing April 21. Mr. Peebles has filed Miss Blanks's affidavit and other documents to back up his motion for a new trial. The state Supreme Court has taken the unusual step of ordering a hearing on the motion before ruling on the Tyler youth's pending appeal of his conviction.

Miss Blanks said in the affidavit that Mr. Pitre and L. J. Hymel, an assistant state attorney general who was asked by parish officials to join the case, had told her before the trial that "they were supposed to charge me with accessory to murder" if she did not testify against Gary Tyler.

Mr. Hymel also declined to comment on details of the case but he said yesterday that the prosecutors would present evidence to rebut Miss Blanks's affidavit. He said that he and Mr. Pitre take the position that the motion for a new trial has "no merit."

One of 11 Children

The Tyler youth, variously described as "vocal" but "not militant," is one of 11 children in the working-class family of Uylos and Juanita Tyler. He was charged in the killing after law enforcement officers reported finding a pistol hidden under the slit cover of one of the bus seats.

Three black students testified that they had seen him holding the pistol in the bus. But only one, Miss Blanks, said she had seen him holding the pistol pointed toward the crowd of white students outside. She testified that she saw that after the sound of a gunshot caused her to turn her head toward him.

One of the two others, Loretta London Thomas, swore in an affidavit last Monday that she had been coerced by the police into signing a statement saying she had seen the gun on the bus when actually she had not seen it.

The motion for a new trial includes that affidavit and a third one from a young black New Orleans lawyer, Sylvia Taylor, in which she tells of a conversation in the judge's chambers the morning the trial began.

ACCUSED OFFICIAL GETS HEALTH POST

But Scoppetta Studies Role In Nursing-Home Cases

By JOHN L. HESS

Nicholas Scoppetta, the Commissioner of Investigation, said last week that he was reviewing the case of Al Schwarz, an assistant health commissioner who was accused by two state commissions of "coziness" with nursing-home operators.

Mr. Schwarz was recently appointed by Dr. Lowell Bellin, the Health Commissioner, to supervise Medicaid and methadone clinics in the city. Dr. Bellin said one reason for making the appointment was that Mr. Schwarz had been cleared by Mr. Scoppetta.

A spokesman for Mayor Beame said Mr. Schwarz had been cleared by the Investigations Commissioner. Apprised of Mr. Scoppetta's statement, the spokesman said the clearance had come in Mr. Scopetta's initial investigation.

Exoneration Claimed

The mayoral spokesman said that the critical reports by the two state commissions were not a basis for action and that the Department of Investigation had found none. Dr. Bellin said that, in fact, Mr. Scoppetta had "exonerated" Mr. Schwarz.

An article in The New York Times on Dec. 12, 1974, reported that Mr. Schwarz had given an "A" rating or Bernard Bergman's Towers Nursing Home despite contrary findings by inspectors and had appeared as a character witness for operators whom he had himself once berated for "filthy conditions and . . . irresponsibility and disregard for the safety, health and welfare of both residents and employees."

A month later, city health inspectors testified before Assemblyman Andrew Stein's Temporary State Commission on Living Costs that Mr. Schwarz had suppressed unfavorable reports and ordered them to write what they called "love letters" instead. One inspector said Mr. Schwarz had approved building plans of a promoter, Charles Sigety, over her objection that it did not meet the code.

Following an appeal by Assemblyman Stein, Mayor Beame ordered Mr. Scoppetta to investigate. Six weeks later it was reported that none of the witnesses had been called. The inquiry then began, but in April Mr. Scoppetta announced that he had turned the data over to Charles J. Hynes, the special prosecutor for nursing homes.

Supressed a Report

At a hearing of the Moreland Act Commission on Nursing Homes last July, Mr. Schwarz confirmed that he had ordered inspectors to stress the positive in their reports, had required that some be rewritten and had suppressed one negative report and rewritten another when the inspector refused to do so. He said also that he had become a friend of Mr. Bergman's and had attended the wedding of a daughter of Mr. Bergman.

The commission devoted a chapter of a report last Feb. 25 to Mr. Schwarz's conduct, which it described as "the most disturbing example found by the commission of coziness between nursing-home owners and a government bureaucrat." Morris B. Abram, its chairman, added in reply to a question: "I wouldn't keep him."

Dr. Bellin said a letter last April from Stanley M. Lupkin, Mr. Scoppetta's deputy, declared that Mr. Schwarz had merely changed the style of the inspector's reports "from negative to positive" and had not deleted any negative items.

Hard-Nosed Evaluation

The Commissioner said he disagreed with the analysis of Mr. Schwarz's testimony by the Moreland Commission and had named Mr. Schwarz to supervise the much-criticized Medicaid and methadone clinics because he had "a reputation among voluntary hospitals of being a very hard-nosed evaluator."

"I didn't say hard-nosed with respect to nursing-home operators," Dr. Bellin added.

Mr. Schwarz could not be reached for comment, but colleagues said he still believed and practiced a "positive" rather than "negative" approach to operators.

Mr. Scoppetta said his investigation had only begun when the special prosecutor asked for the data on Mr. Schwarz. "He's "not clear by a long shot." Mr. Scoppetta said. "It's all part of a review that we're doing now."

Dr. Bellin said that if Mr. Scoppetta had reopened the investigation, it had not come to his attention.

CHURCH IS ACCUSED OF FEMINIST BIAS

Nun Finds No Gospel Barrier to Ordination of Women

By GEORGE DUGAN

More than 600 Roman Catholic nuns, only a handful dressed in traditional habits, broke into sustained applause yesterday when Sister Elizabeth Carroll of the Religious Sisters of Mercy told them that neither the Gospels nor the central doctrines of the church excluded women from the ordained ministry.

Sister Elizabeth, whose snow-white hair matched her short-skirt white dress, attributed the church's discrimination to a "deeply ingrained" antifeminism that appeared some 40 years after Jesus preached the equality of man and woman.

Sister Elizabeth was the key-note speaker at an all-day conference on the ordination of women at Christ the King High School in Middle Village, Queens.

Taboos Defied

According to Sister Elizabeth, Jesus brought to all human beings the power to live on a plane where "there are no distinctions between Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female."

First-century evangelists, she said, portrayed Jesus as defying social categories and taboos to accept women as persons capable of intelligent discourse who journeyed with Him from Galilee to Jerusalem, "remaining faithful beyond most of His male disciples, being entrusted with the most fundamental proclamation of His good news—His resurrection from the dead."

Sister Elizabeth postulated the thesis that some of St. Paul's letters, long viewed as antifeminist, were "not from Paul's hand."

The important fact to be recognized, she said, is that nearly half a century after the death of Jesus "a strong strain of antifeminism" appeared among the followers of Christ that sought to eliminate the influence of woman "within Christian assemblies."

"At any rate," she asserted, "we cannot speak of one unbroken tradition in the church: we must speak of two traditions: that of Jesus and the earliest church and that which countered this tradition and became influential at the time the ordering of church offices was undertaken."

Her reference here was to the establishment of the priesthood and the episcopacy.

"Of immediate relevance to our topic is the fact that the development of such orders occurred in the period when antifeminist parties seem to have been active in the church," she said.

An 'Affront' to Doctrine

"The overwhelmingly male culture provided thus an inadequate response to the initiative of Jesus,' Sister Elizabeth said. "If such be the case, 'sacred tradition' with regard to the exclusion of women from church ministry is not of divine origin, but only the prolongation of an inadequate response imposed on the Gospel message by the dominate culture.

"Our age is notable precisely for the vindication of women's potential in all fields of human endeavor. Hence, the denial of their proper place in ministry to women becomes an affront to that doctrine of personhood, which our church has emphasized, a failure to develop the recognition by Pope Paul VI of women as 'disciples and co-workers' of Jesus, and of Mary as 'the first am

Assembly Unit Urges Dismissal of All Three Members of Racing

By SELWYN RAAB

An Assembly investigative unit called yesterday for the dismissal of all three members of the Racing and Wagering Board, accusing them of failure to regulate the harness racing industry and of blocking audits of the tracks.

The Office of Legislative Oversight and Analysis also asserted that it had obtained information "of the possible connection to elements of organized crime in certain harness track operations."

None of the tracks suspected of having organized-crime problems was identified in a report issued here by the unit, and the report failed to go beyond those charges. But aides in the unit and on the racing board said the tracks under investigation were Roosevelt Raceway on Long Island and four upstate ones — Batavia, Buffalo and Vernon Downs, near Syracuse, and one flat-racing track, Finger Lakes, near Rochester.

Inquiry Under Way

William F. Haddad, head of the Assembly unit, said confidential reports and information about the alleged organized-crime infiltration would be turned over to the State Commission of Investigation, which has started a separate inquiry into the racing board.

The report by Mr. Haddad's office dealt primarily with the finances of Roosevelt and Yonkers Raceways. It reiterated charges made last week by the State Commission of Investigation that the two tracks were being drained of millions of dollars by their parent corporations.

Mr. Haddad described the relationship between the harness tracks in the state and the racing board as "a sweetheart contract."

"The regulators and the regulated are indistinguishable," he said in an interview.

Bertram D. Sarafan, chairman of the racing board, labeled the charges "a lot of claptrap."

"I think this guy Haddad has been smoking a pipe," Mr. Sarafan continued. "I don't know how he or his staff got their expertise, and we don't concede that there has been any wrongdoing on the part of the board."

A Four-Month Study

The report by Mr. Haddad's office—based on a four-month inquiry — acknowledged that there had been no illegalities in the transfer of funds and assets from Roosevelt and Yonkers Raceways to their parent corporations. Roosevelt is owned by Madison Square Garden Corporation and Yonkers by Rooney Associates, a family that owns the Pittsburgh Steelers football team and two other harness tracks.

According to the report, each track engaged in complicated financial dealings — including loans, real estate lease-backs and property transfers—that concealed profits and helped them when lobbying for larger shares of racing revenues from the state.

"One of the chronic complaints of the downstate harness tracks is that they are in jeopardy of going out of business unless the Legislature takes actions which will increase their profits," the report declared and continued:

"Ironically, the Racing and Wagering Board, which has the responsibility of monitoring the tracks, never saw fit to provide either the public or the Legislature with information about the profitability of the tracks."

Charges Are Denied

The report said that the Rooneys, who purchased Yonkers Raceway for $46 million in 1971 will take out approximately $48 million" by 1978."

Furthermore, the report asserted, that through various business arrangement the track is committed to paying the Rooneys a total of $102 million by 1990.

In analyzing the records of Roosevelt Raceway, the Assembly unit said that Madison Square Garden Corporation had been enriched many times over" its 1973 purchase price of $73 million.

Officials of both tracks denied that they misrepresented their financial situations or that the tracks had been milked" by their parent organizations.

If its's so easy to make the kind of money they say we are making why doesn't the state buy us out and solve its financial problems," said Timothy Rooney, president of Yonkers Raceway, said.

Mr. Sarafan, the racing board chairman, said his agency lacked the poser to audit the tracks, which are private businesses. He said, however, that their financial records were "constantly" reviewed by the Internal Revenue Service and the State Tax Department.

Noting that the state gets about $190 million in revenues annually from the racing industry, Mr. Sarafan added: "For reasons I can't comprehend this administration [the Carey administration] is displaying marked hostility to the racing industry. If they keep it up they're going to kill the golden goose."

All Named by Rockefeller

Mr. Sarafan, a former prosecutor in Manhattan and a large-time racing official, receives an annual salary of $58,000. The two other board members, former representative Eugene J. Keogh of Brooklyn and Joseph H. Boyd Jr., each gets $42,500 a year.

The tree members, who a were appointed by former Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller for various terms, could be removed by Governor Carey.

Last week, Governor Carey assailed the board for having "failed to carefully monitor" the finances of Roosevelt and Yonkers Raceways. He gave no indication, however, if he was considerin of any board me

CAREY ASKS FUNDS FOR MORE AUDITORS

Special to The New York Times

ALBANY, March 27—Governor Carey yesterday formally asked the Legislature to restore a $2.2 million appropriation for a special team of nursing-home auditors that the two houses deleted from the budget last week.

The 90 auditors would be part of the Health Department but would be trained and directed by Charles J. Hynes, the special prosecutor for nursing homes.

In a long statement praising Mr. Hynes, the Governor said the restoration of the $2.2 million was "essential."

however, there remained bills and amendments needed to insure further that the budget was balanced and that the agency rescue could be implemented in full.

One of the key points of contention between Mr. Carey and the Legislature involves a request by the Governor for greater flexibility in making the spending cuts that the lawmakers exacted when they approved the budget.

Mr. Carey is seeking authority to transfer up to 10 percent of the funds from one appropriated item to another of his own choosing. The finance law currently entitles him to do so up to 5 percent, but Peter ... Goldmark Jr., the state's Budget Director, has argued that greater latitude is needed because the unusually deep budget cuts may produce unforeseen spending needs during the year.

Aides to the Governor say the legislative leaders had promised two weeks ago to give full consideration to a proposal increasing Mr. Carey's authority in this area. But Republican and Democratic staff members said they had yet to see a sufficiently detailed justification for his requests and doubted that the Legislature would act on any such measure next week.

One adviser to Mr. Carey predicted, however, that the Governor would insist on his request in final negotiations next week as an essential ingredient to the final package of budget bills due for passage. He conceded that the issue might be difficult to resolve.

There were these additional items scheduled for action next week:

¶The new state lottery, which the Governor wants right away because $60 million worth of lottery revenues are incorporated into the budget for the fiscal year beginning Thursday.

Mr. Carey's office and the Senate majority leader, Warren M. Anderson, Republican of Binghamton, were reported "very close to agreement" on a lottery proposal in which the dismissed civil servants in the old lottery system would retain their jobs and it would be decided later just where for which the lotery revenues would go.

The bills enabling the Federal Government to insure mortgages of middle-income housing projects in the Mitchell-Lama program that are financed by the city and state.

Negotiators had still not agreed how much in outright state appropriations would be necessary to satisfy Washington on this essential ingredient to the agency rescue programs. Also, Democrats and Republicans were still apart on whether they could retain some form of rent control in the projects once they were reinsured. Party aides were doubtful that these matters could be resolved next week.

¶Amendments in the area of Medicaid and nursing homes.

It was considered likely that the Legislature would agree to reinstate a $2.2 million budget appropriation for auditors for Charles J. Hynes, the special prosecutor for nursing homes. However, discussion was under way on whether to amend a Medicaid law passed 10 days ago providing for review procedures on setting standards for nursing homes.

One of the most crucial items the Legislature is expected to approve Monday is a $10.1 million appropriation to make up a deficiency in the Housing Finance Agency debt-reserve fund, which would be in technical default if the appropriation is not made by the end of the fiscal year.

SHOW DEPICTS LIFE OF POLAND'S JEWS

Photographic Exhibit Here Covers 1864 to 1939

By IRVING SPIEGEL

Some 400 rare photographs depicting the "richness and vitality" of various phases of Jewish life in Polish towns, cities and hamlets before their destruction by the Nazi regime are on exhibit at the Jewish Museum, 1109 Fifth Avenue, at 92d Street.

Spanning the years, 1864 to 1939, the pictures portray Jewish involvement in Polish society, political and cultural movements and educational institutions.

The camera is a chronicler of Polish Jewry's role in the theater and in cinematic and literary enterprises, as well as in sports.

The exhibit was organized by the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, 1048 Fifth Avenue, a scholarly institution dedicated to the study of East European culture.

The curators of the exhibit are Dr. Lucjan Dobroszycki, a historian of Polish Jewry, and Dr. Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, a specialist in East European Jewish ethnography. Both are associated with YIVO.

There are pictures in the exhibit that depict Jewish family gatherings at the turn of the century; Jewish men, women and children gathered at social events, in attendance at libraries, attending lectures. Others show theatrical performances by Jewish actors and actresses.

YIVO's Polish collection alone contains more than 10,000 photographs, which YIVO officials say is the largest and most representative of its kind.

One official, commenting on the "vibrancy and vitality of Jewish life before Hitler," remarked "the exhibit must have special meaning for American Jews, many of whom are descendants or survivors of that community."

Senate Panel to Study Need For a Teamsters Inquiry

WASHINGTON, March 26 (UPI)—The Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the Senate's Government Operations Committee has authorized a staff study to determine whether an investigation of the teamsters union and the Mafia should be undertaken. Congressional sources disclosed Friday.

The vote was taken privately Thursday.

Senator Robert P. Griffin of Michigan, assistant Senate Republican leader, said that he was "pleased to learn that the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee intends to undertake an investigation of the teamsters union, including allegations of associations with organized crime."

Mr. Griffin noted that he earlier introduced a resolution calling for such an investigation.

'One Person, One Vote' Rule to Upset Regional Boards

By LAWRENCE FELLOWS
Special to The New York Times

HARTFORD, March 27 — Thirty-four towns in Connecticut face the prospect of long and contentious debate following the decision by the United States Supreme Court last Monday upholding a ruling in Federal Court here requiring that the principle of "one person, one vote" be applied to representation on regional school boards.

Instead of the towns sitting as equals on their regional school boards, their representation will depend on the size of their population. Control will be put in the hands of the larger towns.

"I suspect in some regions there are going to be some political difficulties," said the State Education Commissioner, Mark R. Shedd.

There are 16 regional school districts in Connecticut. All but five of them face the problem of reorganizing and shifting control, or of allowing member towns to secede to run their schools on their own.

The 11 regions that face the problems comprise 34 towns—a fifth of the towns in the state. These are mainly rural and suburban, with relatively small populations.

"To be quite frank about it, we've really got to sit down and do some planning and see what's best," said Jerry Caires, the first selectman of Bethlehem.

District Formed in '69

Bethlehem, with a third as many people as Woodbury, has enjoyed equal representation with that town in the Nonnewaug Regional School District, which these two towns formed in 1969 on the suburban southern edge of Litchfield County.

It was their case that was taken to the Supreme Court by a group headed by Joseph M. Scott of Woodbury; the court action was widely resented in Bethlehem.

"Bethlehem has been very vocal. There has been a study to see if they could break away," said George F. Bradlau, superintendent of the Nonnewaug district.

"We'll have town meetings," Mr. Caires said. "If we feel that it's necessary, we'll have a referendum."

Breaking away would be difficult after years of financial encouragement from the state for the regional concept. The state has covered 80 percent of school-construction costs for the regions, and only 50 percent for the towns and cities on their own.

The state has given the regions 20 percent more than the others in the financial support based on school attendance. It has covered half the regions' transportation costs without the $20 yearly limit per pupil it imposes on the cities and towns that are not in regional districts.

Now that the appeals in this case and in another Connecticut case like it have been exhausted, the Commissioner and the State Board of Education must begin, by a process established by the Connecticut General Assembly last year, to bring the regional boards into compliance with the law within five months. The Assembly is now considering legislation that would permit towns to withdraw from regional boards if they want.

"I'm greatly disappointed," said George Gray, a former member of the school board in Colebrook, which shares Northwest Regional High School in a district with Barkhamsted, New Hartford and Norfolk, and which will be swamped by the others when the voting arrangements on the regional board are brought into line with the new ruling.

"They give the boot to the small towns, and the larger cities have the say," Mr. Gray said.

"I just think this is going to create problems," said Gerard W. Lewis, a second selectman in Norfolk, which does not stand to fare much better.

"I don't think it's going to iron out anything," he said. "I'd like it to stay one big happy family."

Town to Get Navy Bell On Bicentennial Loan

NORFOLK, Va., March 27 (AP)—The Navy has executed an about-face and decided to lend a Civil War-era ship's bell to a small Tennessee town for its Bicentennial celebration.

The Navy first said it was reluctant to turn over the 400-pound bell to Tullahoma, Tenn., because the men assigned to the Navy's Shore Patrol headquarters here — where the brightly polished bell hangs — did not want to give it up. But on Monday it decided that Tullahoma could borrow the bell, after all.

The bell once hung on the 947-ton sidewheel Civil War gunboat Tullahoma, built in the New York Navy Yard in 1863. The ship went into service in late 1865, missed the Civil War completely, and was stripped of her armament two years later and sold to a private shipper.

by The Times:

¶Awareness of grade inflation—more A's and B's, fewer C's and D's—has become widespread in the academic world, and there is increasing determination to adopt tougher grading procedures.

¶An important but often unnoticed factor in grade inflation has been the increased use of an "incomplete" grade by students in courses in which they think they might get low scores.

¶A major failure of the reform movement has been the steady abandonment of the "pass/fail" grade that was supposed to encourage students to take courses without worrying about grades.

¶Flexibility in the curriculum has become firmly established. Although a minority of colleges and universities never loosened their requirements, few of those that did are willing to go back to the rigidities of the past.

¶Disillusionment and disappointment have replaced the early enthusiasm for proposals to share campus power with students.

Of all the changes of recent years, grade inflation has been one of the most noticeable and controversial. The weight of popular opinion seems to be that higher grades are indicative of lower standards, rather than of more able students.

"We really don't fail anyone unless he's really dumb or insulting," said Dr. Rocco E. Porreco, a philosophy professor and former graduate dean at Georgetown University in Washington.

A faculty committee at the University of NNeNw haven Connecticut concluded that with 25 percent of the students on the dean's list a sort of honor roll, "the time may come when all grades will be meaningless"; the average grade at Kenon College in Ohio, with a possible maximum of 4, has risen in the last 20 years from 2.58 to 2.96; and the University of North Carolina is considering "devaluing" its inflated grades by turning A's into B's, B's into C's and so on down the scale.

A 'Forgiveness' Plant

The University of Florida has a "grade forgiveness" policy that lets a student take a course again rather than accept a low grade; Ohio State University has had more graduates with straight A averages since 1971 than in its first 100 years; and the University of Texas, where professors are complaining that "students can't write," is giving A's and B's in English to 68 percent of its freshmen.

There is no one explanation for the phenomenon of higher grades, but the desire of professors in the Vietnam era to help students maintain good enough averages to stay in school and out of the war is often cited as an early cause.

Furthermore, the waning recognition in schools of an intellectual elite, based on academic achievement, and a belief by some professors that grades are essentially worthless have contributed to the awarding of fewer low grades.

"Professors with social consciences felt it was important to grade very, very generously," said Dr. John E. Baldwin, liberal arts dean at the University of Oregon. "They felt, historically and philosophically, that the grading system was inherently corrupt so they gave grades in such a manner that no one would take grades too seriously."

More recently, sympathetic faculty members have conceded that they have been under intense pressure to give higher grades to help students get into medical and law schools and other graduate programs.

There has been a marked increase, for instance, in the number of Columbia students who, receiving final grades with which they are dissatisfied, go to professors to plead for higher marks, the registrar's office says.

The situation around the country is such that the economics chairman at Oberlin College in Ohio, who says there has been no grade inflation in his department, felt compelled to write to major graduate schools to which Oberlin seniors might apply. He thought this necessary to protect his students, whose undergraduate records are being compared with those of students whose records reflect the advantage of grade inflation.

Efforts to stem grade inflation are growing, and some institutions are following the lead of universities such as Yale and Stanford that have reinstituted the low marks they had abandoned.

Harvard has just tightened its standards for awarding degrees with honors because almost 85 percent of its seniors were winning such honors.

Stanford has also restricted the use of the "incomplete" grade, the course status that many of the nation's students have requested to avoid the risk of a low score.

Columbia is also re-examining "incompletes," which have come to represent 5 percent of all marks on students' records. No Columbia student with two or more "incompletes" will be allowed to register for a subsequent semester.

Disenchantment Shared

The decreasing use of the "pass fail" option has resulted from the disenchantment with it by the students and the schools.

"We found that students who took courses in the pass fail program did not work in those courses at their level of capacity," said Paul Ginsberg, dean of students at the University of Wisconsin, where the policy is being re-evaluated.

Students have been tending to avoid the pass/fail option because they suspect, rightly or wrongly, that actual grades may look better on the transcripts accompanying their applications to graduate and professional schools.

New York University, which let a student take one pass/fail course a semester, now warns students upon registration that this mark in a major or minor may be viewed negatively by graduate admissions committees.

The trend away from pass/fail is apparent on many campuses. Rhode Island School of Design has just decided, after a five-year experiment, to do away with the mark, and the University of Chicago reports a 75 percent drop in pass/fail registrations.

Reform Still Sought

The emphasis on letter grades and the tightening grading standards do not, however, indicate a turning away from academic reform generally.

There are only isolated reports of colleges and universities restoring rigid curriculum features that were removed in the late 1960's. There is no trend in the nation's elementary and secondary schools.

It is difficult to find the reasons for the drift away from student involvement in institutional governance. The situation at the University of Florida is not atypical.

Benefits, Radiation Risks In Breast Cancer Debated

By JANE E. BRODY

Special to The New York Times

ST. PETERSBURG BEACH, Fla., March 27 — The use of radiation to detect and treat breast cancer, both the subjects of intense controversy among medical experts, was discussed here yesterday at the American Cancer Society's seminar for science writers.

The detection issue involves the safety of annual breast X-rays, or mammograps, received by 300,000 women who will be participating in 27 breast cancer detection projects sponsored by the cancer society and the National Cancer Institute.

The institute conceded yesterday that the 245,000 women so far enrolled in the detection study were never told that there might be some risk involved.

The treatment question surrounds the effectiveness of therapies that do not require the removal of a breast—specifically, radiation therapy— to treat certain cases of breast cancer.

Unjustifiable Risk Seen

Dr. John Bailar, a staff scientist at the cancer institute, has asserted that five years of annual X-rays will eventually cause as many breast cancers as it detects and therefore represents an unjustifiable risk to study participants.

However, officials at the cancer society and the institute said that Dr. Bailar had greatly overestimated the potential hazard. This happened, thay said, because he extrapolated from data that involved much higher doses of radiation delivered to younger women, who are known to be more sensitive to radiation's effects.

Even using Dr. Bailar's assumptions, cancer society statisticians calculated that 38 lives would be extended through such a screening program for every five or six deaths caused by radiation-induced cancers, giving a benefit-to-risk ratio of 6 or 7 to 1.

Dr. Frank Rauscher, director of the cancer institute, said that a new consent form that tells study participants of the possible dangers of mammography would soon be in use.

Doses Vary

Dr. Benjamin Byrd, a breast cancer surgeon who is president of the cancer society, emphasized that the radiation dose used in mammography is relatively, very low—about two rads per examination. This dose is 20 times that involved in a chest X-ray, but only a tiny fraction of the amount of radiation used in cancer therapy.

Dr. Byrd added that the only real concern was the possible risk to women younger than 40 years old. The screening project includes women 35 and older.

Dr. Rauscher said that 30 percent of the 670 cancers detected so far through the screening program were in women younger than 50. He said, however, that if the benefits to women younger than 40 proved not to justify the potential risks, mamography would not be recommended for this group.

Dr. Byrd pointed out that, after a breast cancer starts, it takes three to five years to grow into a detectable lump, and that at least 250,000 American women now have breast cancers that will not become evident for several years.

Early Detection

However, screening—which, in addition to mammography, includes manual examination and thermography to detect "hot spots" in the breast—can pick up many of these hidden cancers in their early, most curable stages, Dr. Byrd said.

High doses of radiation as a means of treating breast cancer have long been used by European physicians, who maintain that the cure rate with radiation is just as good as that following removal of the breast, or mastectomy, the usual treatment in this country.

At the meeting here, Dr. Samuel Hellman, a Harvard University radiologist, said preliminary results of a study he is conducting indicate that in the early stages of breast cancer, radiationn therapy may be as effective as mastectomy.

Dr. Hellman and his colleagues first remove the cancerous lump, and then give radiation treatments, sometimes temporarily implanting radioactive substances in the breast area. Most of the patients have been followed for two years or longer after the treatment.

19 Patients

In 19 patients who were thought to have had no spread of their cancer to the lymph nodes, in the armpit, there has been no recurrence of cancer in the breast area, and only one patient had it spread to a distant part of the body, Dr. Hellman reported.

Dr. Hellman said he was also using anticancer drugs—chemotherapy—to treat patients thought to have cancer in the nodes in hopes of preventing later spread elsewhere.

The radiologist reported that in these patients the radiation therapy produced no serious side effects and left the patient with one breast only slightly different in size and shape from the other.

"I'm very encouraged by the results so far, but, I'd be less than honest if I said they would continue this way," Dr. Hellman remarked. With regard to the potential for cure through radiation therapy, he added, "There is a level of uncertainty greater than that associated with mastectomy."

Ship Will Explore Basins Of Ocean in Southeast Asia

LA JOLLA, Calif., March 27 (AP)—The research ship Thomas Washington is off on a six-month expedition in which scientists of seven nations will explore ocean basins in Southeast Asia.

The aim is to learn how mineral deposits are formed, according to George Shore Jr., associate director of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography, which owns the 209-foot ship that departed Tuesday.

"The island arcs of Southeast Asia are an active natural laboratory in which deposits from the sea floor are being pushed under the continents in some places and up on top of continental rocks in others," Mr. Shore said.

The National Science Foundation and United Nations are co-sponsors of the explorations. Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand and the Republic of the Philippines and Korea are taking part.

Steps Are Outlined

At a second stage, a specific caseworker doing a face-to-face interview would also handle follow-up problems in changes of the client's needs and six-month recertifications. A third unit would have a specific caseworker handle a client's needs for social services, and this would be brought back "within each center to counsel and assist applicants to become self-supporting."

Stuart Leibowitz, the union's vice president for negotiations and research, said the Human Resources Administration had 3,800 caseworkers whose minimum experience now was six years, in view of layoffs of more recent employees. Their ranks, he said, could be augmented by transfers without extra cost.

"The city is drowning in welfare," Mr. Leibowitz said. "For every additional dollar being spent on welfare, the city is jeopardizing everything else."

Mr. Knight said the face-to-face interviews could start at once, while other changes would probably be phased in through some trial centers—"we have our eye on two centers," he said.

Meanwhile, the State Department of Social Services said final results of a mail eligibility survey of 300,000 cases here started last Nov. 25 had closed 6,689 more cases because of client failure to return questionnaires.

This brought the total closings in the joint state-city effort to 10,955 cases involving more than 31,000 people. With closings and transfer of some home relief cases to federally aided welfare family status, savings were estimated at $25 million a year.

The state and city would save $9.6 million each and the Federal Government $5.8 million, after assuming, in line with past experience, that half the cases closed would be reopened within six months because of new need.

40 STUDENTS END BRIDGEPORT SIT-IN Group Still Seeks to Save Black Instructor's Job

Special to The New York Times

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., March 27—Forty black students protesting the cost-cutting dismissal of the University of Bridgeport's only Afro-American history instructor ended a 24-hour occupation of the university president's office yesterday, but said they were looking into possible legal action to save the instructor's job.

The popular instructor, Isaiah Robinson, who was hired in 1971, is one of two blacks on the 300-member faculty. He is one of the two nontenured members of the history department who will be et go in May in a retrenchment that has already cut 35 positions from the faculty of the university and that will cut 35 more positions this year.

Since 1970, when enrollment reache a peak of 9,000, the university has had its share of recession- and inflation-related problems, including a three-day faculty strike last September and a student demonstration last week against an 8.7 percent tuition increase, to $3,100 next fall. Enrollment has fallen to 7,300, with about 400 of the total minority students.

Probmes Deseribed

In the fall of 1974, the university disclosed an accumulated deficit of $3.5 million. A $3 million long-term loan a was obtained and, under a new president, Dr. Leland Miles, the university began an extensive program of retrenchment.

Dr. Miles last week told the students who were protesting against the tuition rise about some of the university's problems, including a $700,000 payroll increase and the fact that its endowment was only $6 million.

"We are a poorer school," Dr. Miles a said.

However, the students protesting Mr. Robinson's dismissal way that the university is using retrenchment as an excuse. They say it has failed to live up to a long standing moral commitment to build up a black faculty. And the students expecially incensed by the dismissal of the only instructor in Afro-American history.

After the sit-in ended, Linda Waller, a spokesman for the Black Students Alliance, said that the group had told Mr. Miles during the sit-in that it wanthd Mr. Robinson retained unconditionally, and that Dr. Miles's response had a failed to satisfy the group. She said he had asked the group to wait a week or 10 days. She said the students could not say yet what their next step would be, except that legal action was being considered.

Miss Waller said that in another meeting last week Dr. Miles had told the students that Mr. Robinson could not be kept on without a corresponding t elsewhere in the budget.

Seminar Is Picketed

She said there had been no trouble during the sit-in, except that the phones were cut off and the campus police barred the entrances.

Before occupying Dr. Miles's office at noon Thursday, the students picketed for about two hours outside the student center, where 80 businessmen and municipal officials were attending a seminar on affirmative-action hiring practices.

Among the demonstrators was J. Michael Smith, a university alumnus who now is president of the Bridgeport area National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He addressed the seminar briefly. Describing the seminar as "window dressing," Mr. Smith said the university itself was not following affirmative-action principles—otherwise it would retain Mr. Robinson.

A university spokesman replied, "We do have a program of affirmative action, but it is difficult to meet in times of retrenchment."

Mr. Robinson's situation—he is a doctoral candidate at New York University—is complicated by the fact that he has been under consideration for tenure after a five-year probation and, while judged not to have met the tenure requirements yet, he has been recommended for two more year's probation by his department. He was turned down, according to Prof. Alfred Gerteiny, the former department chairman, because the administration said it had allocated the teaching position elsewhere.

Presidency Is Found to Have Lost Power Under I

that following the Civil War.

Most experts agree that the Ford White House is enmeshed in a complex web of constraints of a kind that were not felt by Administrations of the recent past.

Some of these constraints appear temporary, affecting only this President rather than the Presidency itself. Others spring from legal and institutional changes or from long-term shifts in domestic and international political patterns and may turn out to be durable.

Part of Mr. Ford's weakness stems from the fact that he is a nonelected President, the first to take office under the 25th amendment to the Constitution. Also he is a Republican President at a time when the Democrats have a 2-to-1 majority in Congress. These factors are likely to change with the next election.

Mr. Ford's own bland public personality, as well as his social philosophy, which leans toward a passive role for the Federal Government in domestic affairs, have undoubtedly reduced the power of the executive branch. These limitations would continue only if Mr. Ford were re-elected.

Legislative Constraints

But the legislation passed by Congress putting limits on the President's war-making powers is a constraint that will have to be faced by any future President, at least for the foreseeable future. So too, in all likelihood, will be the new authority Congress has assumed with its budget reform program.

Other recent developments may or may not prove ephemeral. One of these is the diminished respect of the public for the Presidency and government in general as a result of the Watergate scandals.

Broader historical trends, such as the declining global influence of the United States, also affect Presidential power but to an extent difficult to assess.

Despite all the recent changes, almost all observers grant that the office of the President of the United States retains awesome powers and the capacity to build upon those powers in the future.

There are daily reminders that a President can still push a weak Congress around and strongly influence public opinion. The most dramatic recent reminder was Mr. Ford's counterattack on the secrecy issue.

After more than a year of investigation of abuses by the nation's intelligence community operating under a cloak of secrecy, Mr. Ford and his aides have been able to call for more secrecy and, apparently, to rally some public support for his proposal.

The sudden surge of political strength demonstrated by President Ford in his recent primary victories over Ronald Reagan, despite rather low public assessments of his performance in office, is regarded as another indication that the office is still held in respect and reverence by Americans.

Spiral of Power

Nevertheless, most of more than a score of White House aides, Congressional leaders, insiders from previous Administrations and scholars interviewed in recent weeks, generally agreed that the long ascending spiral of Presidential power has been slowed and in some ways arrested by events of the last few years.

Most of those interviewed agreed with Mr. Ford's contention that the "basic powers" of the President were essentially intact.

But what has changed, many believe, is the freedom of the President to self-arrogate and abuse power—to act arbitrarily and illegally. Vietnam and Watergate, they said, restored the ability of Congress, the courts, the bureaucracy, the press and public opinion to check and balance Presidential power — at least for the moment.

The problem of what the historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. called "The Imperial Presidency" has been traced to different roots by different commentators.

Some say the expanding power of the executive branch began with President Franklin D. Roosevelt's measures to deal with the Depression and World War II. Others insist the power of the Presidency has been expanding since the earliest days of the Republic.

There is little dispute, however, that Presidents have increased their powers dramatically, encroaching on Congressional prerogatives and some individual rights in the process.

This accretion of Presidential power reached a climax with the secret, unilateral exercise of war powers by President Johnson and the criminal acts and unconstitutional methods during Richard M. Nixon's Presidency.

Schlesinger View

"The Imperial Presidency," Mr. Schlesinger wrote in his book of that title, "was essentially the creation of foreign policy."

Of late, however, the right of the President to act unilaterally in foreign policy and national security affairs is being sharply challenged by Congress and curtailed by other forces.

One major challenge is the war powers resolution that Congress passed to prevent another Vietnam-like exercise of Presidential power. The resolution permits the President to commit armed forces on his own initiative in an emergency, but only upon consultation with Congress. The forces are subject to recall by Congress after 60 days.

White House Photograph

President Ford being briefed during the Mayaguez incident last May. He acted unilaterally, committing U.S. forces to military action after notifying Congressmen.

Some commentators have said that the War Powers Act would have the opposite effect on Presidential power than that intended by giving formal sanction to the President to commit forces at least for brief periods without Congressional approval where no such sanction existed before.

Raoul Berger, the constitutional scholar at Harvard, wrote that passage of the act marked "the end of an era." Professor Berger continued:

"Henceforth, unilateral war-making by the President would not go unchallenged. The resolution premised that there are constitutional metes and bounds to war-making by the President; and it signaled that Congress meant to resume its place in the sun. Watergate served to hammer home the lesson of Vietnam — Presidential disregard of constitutional limits threatens our Democratic system."

Congress Asserts Itself

Congress has signaled in other ways that it is reasserting authority over the nation's foreign policy and war-making decisions. Refusal to grant the President the means to conduct open or covert military operations in Angola, resistance to military aid to Turkey, the passage of a trade bill with special restrictions on the Soviet Union are all indications that Congress is resisting a further accretion of Presidential power at its expense.

"For the time being at least, Congress is resurgent," said Senator Mike Mansfield, the Senate majority leader, during a recent interview. "Congress," he added, "is now trying to bring about an equality of power between the executive and legislative branches."

Another way that the Congress is trying to bring about equality is to insist on exercising its oversight function on authority delegated to the President. The controversial House and Senate hearings on United States intelligence operations were examples of a Congressional pugnacity in exerting its oversight rights.

As part of this new assertiveness, Congress has been refusing in many instances to take "no" for an answer when demanding information from the executive branch.

This was demonstrated when Congressional committees threatened contempt citations against two Cabinet officers, Secretary of State Kissinger and then Secretary of Commerce Rogers C. B. Morton, for withholding subpoenaed information.

Invocation of Security

Less formal restraints have also affected the President's ability to conduct foreign policy unilaterally. Joseph A. Califano Jr., former aide to President Johnson, and author of "A Presidential Nation," pointed out that the Presidential invocation of "national security" in justifying controversial steps was losing its potency.

In part the national security argument is no longer very effective because it was badly abused by President Nixon and others. But it is also dying a natural death.

Attorney General Levi believes the nation is finally moving out of the "overhanging shadow" of the national emergency of World War II.

Détente, when seen as the lessening of tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union, is viewed by a number of the experts as a limitation on the President's ability to conduct foreign policy.

In the absence of confrontation with the Soviet Union and the perceived need of a strong, unfettered President to handle it, the President's freedom to act has been limited. During the cold war, the President was given more of a blank check to conduct foreign policy.

An even more important constraint, in the view of many of the Presidential experts, is that the trauma of Vietnam and the general disillusionment at its conclusion have discredited wars initiated solely by the President.

Henry F. Graff, a professor of history at Columbia University who is an expert on the Presidency, noted the growth of some amorphous restraints on the President's powers to conduct foreign policy. One of these is the waning of American global power, perforce reducing the authority of the President of the United States in the international arena.

Factors Beyond Control

Professor Graff also pointed to an increasing number of foreign policy factors that are beyond the control of the President, including the world oil supply, diminishing natural resources and the growth of multinational corporations.

The reaction to ballooning Presidential power is also discernible in the domestic area. Perhaps the single most important constraint on Presidential power adopted in recent years, in the view of many of the experts, has been the Congressional budget control process.

This was adopted in reaction to wholesale impoundment by Mr. Nixon of funds allocated by Congress. Members of Congress were outraged, believing that the President was stripping the legislature of one of its most important prerogatives, the power of the purse.

Senator Walter F. Mondale, Democrat of Minnesota, who recently published a book called "The Accountability of Power," said in an interview that the budget control process had had "more impact than I expected."

Because the process is giving Congress equal capacity with the President to control the budget, he explained, it means that Congress and the President are sharing accountability for national policy decisions as well.

As an example, Senator Mondale noted that, because of the Budget Control Act, Congress was able to cut back on the President's defense spending requests for the first time in a long while.

'Legislative Veto'

Another significant recent assertion of power by Congress, in the view of many observers, has been the "legislative veto" written into many new laws.

Just the other day, for example, the Senate approved a $3 billion foreign military aid bill that reserved to Congress the right to veto arms sales after they had been made.

The energy bill passed by Congress authorizes the Administration to take action to increase to develop and conserve fuel, but requires the Federal Energy Administration to report back to Congress and allows Congress to reverse actions already taken.

Recent institutional changes have also checked the accumulation of power within the Oval Office. For one thing, the growth of the White House staff, considered by many observers to be a sure sign of concentrating power, has been reversed in the Ford Administration.

James E. Connor, White House staff and Cabinet secretary, reported that the size of the full-time White House staff was down to 485 full-time employee, from a high of 555 in 1971 during President Nixon's first term.

The number of White House staff members holding Presidential commissions, that is, senior policy-making staff members, is down to 29 from a high of around 50. The size of most other executive office staffs, such as the Office of Management and Budget, is being reduced or held steady, Mr. Connor said.

The White House staff is still swollen by historical standards, but its growth at least has been arrested under Mr. Ford's non-elected Presidency.

Another institutional change has been the partial comeback of the Cabinet under Mr. Ford. One way Mr. Nixon arrogated power to himself was to appoint nonentities to many of the Cabinet positions, ignore the Cabinet as a policy-making instrument, and run the Federal agencies either from the White House or through agents in the various departments.

Diminished Respect

Harder to measure, but viewed by almost all observers in and out of Government as one of the most significant new constraints on Presidential power, has been the diminished respect among both the news media and the public for the Presidency following the disgrace and forced resignation of Mr. Nixon.

Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, noted that "the President is under much more intense scrutiny by press and public than ever before."

President Ford, Mr. Nessen said, "has been able to regain some moral authority because he is truthful and honest. But there is a public mood that anything is possible from the President. There is an inclination to disbelieve anything. That is the damage Nixon did. He made everybody cynics."

In many ways, of course, Watergate, Vietnam and other events of recent history have left Presidential power relatively untouched.

Almost every law passed by Congress, for example, still delegates authority to the President and the executive branch.

That the President can still act unilaterally was demonstrated by the Mayaguez incident last year, when Mr. Ford committed American forces to rescue an American merchant ship that had been captured by Cambodian gunboats—after notification of members of Congress.

Mr. Ford, like other past Presidents, was able to act in this fashion because, unlike members of Congress who share authority, he alone is vested with power in the executive branch.

Executive Power

Mr. Ford has also demonstrated that the Presidential veto, which he has exercised 46 times—and been overridden but eight times—remains a potent instrument of Presidential power. Despite the overwhelming control of Congress by the opposition party, President Ford has had considerable success in implementing his social and economic policies.

Mr. Ford has also demonstrated that the President remains the only political figure who can command continual national attention on pretty much his own terms.

In fact, most of the White House officials, members of Congress and scholars interviewed, agreed, along with President Ford, that, despite Vietnam and Watergate, the inherent powers of the Presidency remain essentially intact.

What has changed as a result of the upheavals of recent years, is the development of constraints on the President's ability to exercise the powers of his office.

Most of all, in the view of many of the experts, the experience of Vietnam and Watergate will require Presidents to seek consensus before exercising power—consensus within the executive branch, with Congress and among the American people.

The strength and permanence of these limitations will be among the issues that will be tested by the national election in this Bicentennial year.

Many, although not all, senior White House officials fear that a shift of the "historic pendulum" of power from the executive to the legislative branch will seriously impede the President's ability to govern for many years.

Congressional leaders, believing that Congress has surrendered too much authority to the President, say they are determined to regain lost prerogatives.

Mansfield View

"I believe that Congress will retain momentum," observed Senator Mansfield of Montana. "There will be a slow and deliberate effort by Congress to reassert its own power. Of course we have to be sure the pendulum doesn't swing too far in the other direction. But the President will not continue to accumulate more power at the expense of Congress. There will be no more Vietnams."

In response to questions about the report, Gerald J. Gallinghouse, the United States Attorney in New Orleans, said, "This entire matter is part of a continuing investigation." Beyond that, he said, "it would be inappropriate for me to comment."

Bunge's president, Mr. Klein, said in response to questions, "These allegations present no new facts from those involved in the Government's actions against the company last year."

Calls Variations Normal

He asserted that both overages and shortages of grain normally occur at grain elevators for a variety of reasons, including spills, moisture changes, leaks in conveying equipment and normal weight variations within scale tolerances. "This will also result in inventory adjustments," he said. "When multiplied by the millions of bushels handled at export elevators, these adjustments may become substantial. But the appearance of an overage or shortage does not, on the face of it, necessarily mean that some improper activity occurred, although, of course, it is possible that such an improper activity could cause an overage or shortage, or could occur without there being any overage or shortage.

"At no time was the company aware of or did it ever countenance any wrongdoing."

According to the report, Miss Hibbs told the agents that income from the overages was anticipated each year by Bunge officials when discussing budgets and projected income. She told them that money earned from the overages was entered in profit and loss statements under a category labeled "other income."

Substantial Profit

"Other income," according to internal company records reviewed by The New York Times, sometimes represented a substantial portion of total profits.

Miss Hibbs told the agents that she kept a record of income from the overages, which she also called grain "adjustments."

For one elevator, at Galveston, according to its profit and loss statements, "other income" totaled more than $1.5 million over a nine-year period, from 1966 to 1974.

Supplementary records indicate that "quantity adjustments" sometimes represented a substantial part of "other income." In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966, when Galveston's "other income" was shown as $319,000, the "quantity adjustment" factor in a supplementary record was shown as $306,600.

The next year its "other income" was listed as $585,300 and the "quantity adjustment" as $550,788. In that year the company's total income was listed as $3.2 million.

Like most large grain companies, Bunge is a private corporation, and its accounting records have been closely held company secrets. But a review of records on corporate and Galveston elevator financial results was arranged by The Times through a source close to Bunge.

2 Types of Entries

In further response to questions, Mr. Klein, the bunge president, said:

"When any overage or shortage occurs, two types ofaccounting entries are requirel to reconcile the book inventory with the physical inventory to place them back in balance: (1) a dollar adjustment and (2) a quantity adjustment.

"In order to make the dollar adjustment, the value of the grain must be determined either from within the company or from without. The fact that an individual would be asked the current value of grain in order to make an inventory adjustment would not create suspicion that there was some improper activitp involved.

"With respect to the quantity aljustment, the proper method of handling the records is to reflect that the adjustment is the result of an overage or a shortage. That this aspect of the adjustment was not properly handled on a local level was a part of the Government's proceeding against the companp as reported by the press at the time."

New York Transaction

In her interview with the F.B.I. agents, according to their report, Miss Hibbs gave a detailed account of the handling of the excess grain and resulting profits. It quoted her on the following accounting sequence and interoffice transactions:

First, she said, whenever the grain elevator had accumulated about 50,000 bushels of excess grain—approximately one bargeload—the elevator manager would "telephonically contact either Walton Mulloy or herself."

Mr. Mulloy would then call the New York office, "which would then contact the man in charge of the trading account pertaining to the grain commodity in New York City and advise him of the overage," she reported, and that individual would give Mr. Mulloy a price for the excess grain.

An interoffice contract would be prepared, she said incating that the pertinent grain division had bought the grain from the elevator. A credit memorandum would also be prepared crediting the export elevator with "the number of bushels involved at a certain amount of money" and debiting the "appropriate export division."

An internal voucher would also be prepared detailing the transaction, she added

The elevator manager, she said, would give Miss Hibbs or Mr. Mulloy the number of a barge that had been to the elevator within about four preceding weeks and would indicate on elevator records that the same barge had unloaded the amount of grain specified in the in contract.

The dame barge number would also be entered on the interoffice contract "as if it had unloaded the amount of grain in the contract," she added.

Crowds Jam Washington Subway in Opening of 4.6-Mile St

man called "good-natured riders."

Because of public fear of assaults and muggings in the subway — despite an elaborate system of closed-circuit television monitors and vaulting, open stations designed to discourage lurkers and graffiti artists — a major concern of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority has been crime deterrence. Today, Metro trains and platforms were patrolled by extra details of transit policemen and red-coated, red-capped attendants.

86-Station Network

Beginning next year, longer sections are added in stages, to what is planned to be an 86-station network of city and suburban Metro lines. Transit officials here hope that the fast subway running times will then begin to lure the thousands of one-to-a-car automobile commuters from their vehicles.

Metro lines reaching far into the Maryland and Virginia suburbs are not to be finally completed until the early 1980's.

After the opening of the system's second phase next year, the schedule time from Washington National Airport to the city's center will be 16 minutes. The line opening in 1977 will also serve the Capitol and the city-owned stadium and armory, where there are thousands of "fringe" parking spaces for automobiles.

The abbreviated system opens Monday on a 6 A.M.-to-8 P.M. fare-paying basis, 55 cents in rush hours and 40 cents at off-peak times. The free introduction to the Metro today followed a "Metro here and now" dedication ceremony in the automobile parking lot at the Rhode Island Avenue station and subway maintenance yard, the eastern end of the opening section.

Wave of Criticism

The tone of determination to complete the system was set in remarks by Mayor Walter E. Washington of the District of Columbia, Gov. Marvin Mandel of Maryland, representatives of Virginia and the Department of Transportation—the jurisdictions involved in the multibillion-dollar mass transit venture. Their remarks reflected the criticisms and doubts that have come from some suburban political leaders here as the Metro construction budget went far beyond the original estimates.

But Mr. Washington, the strongly pro-subway black Mayor of the nation's most-black major city (70 percent black), said, "The Metro will bind us all in the metropolitan area closer, bring us all together at our jobs and in understanding each other's cultures, to a point at which we know and understand each other better."

The opening today of only 5 percent of the nearly 100-mile projected Metro subway system was described by transit officials here as symbolic and pragmatic.

The subway's debut partly fulfilled nearly 50 years of dreams and hopes by proponents of rapid rail systems. Five Presidents gave crucial support to the Metro system.

President Eisenhower signed the law creating the transit agency that began planning the subway. President Kennedy sent to Congress legislation providing for the original 83-mile system. President Johnson signed the bill into law.

$1.1 Billion Authorized

President Nixon obtained the initial $1.1 billion authorization from Congress that made possible a start on construction in 1969, and later a crucial Federal guarantee that made possible the sale of $1.2 billion in Metro bonds.

And in recent months, when inflation-fed construction costs were doubling original subway tunneling estimates and the will to keep digging began to flag, President Ford and William T. Coleman Jr., the Secretary of Transportation, recommitted the Federal Government to completion of the entire subway system with unused interstate highway funds.

The $2.5 billion 1969 cost estimate for the entire system has risen to $4.65 billion and is expected to go still higher. Accordingly, the subway's chronic fiscal and political crises, with eight Washington-area governmental jurisdictions often in conflict over fiscal and construction strategy, is not over.

One reason for the opening today of so foreshortened a trackage was to give subway officials a chance to find any flaws in their new mechanical and electronic equipment during a year's trial on the 4.6-mile run, thus avoiding service breakdowns on longer lines that will be opening later.

There was a certain predictability about some of the equipment failures today — trains without destination signs, car doors that did not close, squealing brakes and jerky stops, and station lights that did not come on.

U.S. Figures on Unemployment Challenged as Low by St. Louis

By PAUL DELANEY
Special to The New York Times

ST. LOUIS, March 25—Cities like St. Louis have complained for years that widespread undercounting by Federal agencies results in the loss of millions of dollars the municipalities would receive otherwise.

The Bureau of the Census has been besieged by complaints ever since it acknowledged that there had been a significant undercount of poor and minority residents in the 1970 census. Some cities demanded an adjustment in order to be eligible for more revenue-sharing funds.

And now, the city of St. Louis has challenged the monthly unemployment report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, an agency considered sacrosanct among the bureaucracies of the Federal establishment.

A study commissioned by the city charged that the bureau's monthly jobless rate for St. Louis, and by extension every big city with sizable numbers of poor and minority residents, was far off the mark and represented a significant undercounting, thereby causing the city to lose up to $4 million in manpower funds.

The study, by four researchers at the University of Missouri at St. Louis, challenged the bureau's official unemployment rates for the city for September, October and November 1975. Those figures were 11.8 percent, 11.9 and 11.4 respectively.

The researchers said that their findings showed the rates should have been 19.2 percent for September, 16.3 percent for October and 15.1 percent for November.

The study said the reason for the undercount was the use of outmoded and inadequate statistical procedures by the Bureaus of the Census and Labor Statistics. Some of the procedures date back to the 1930's, the report said. Further, the researchers said that conventional methods of measuring unemployment systematically underestimated unemployment by not adequately taking into account the work experience of minorities and the poor.

The authors of the study disagreed with the Labor Department's definition of "discouraged workers," who are excluded from the statistics. The authors also said that the department's figures were national and did not truly reflect local circumstances.

Further, the researchers felt that the total number of households used in the Federal sample, 180, was much too small when compared to the 1,560 in the study's sample.

'Discouraged Workers'

"Discouraged workers" are those who tried but failed to find work in four or more weeks and are not counted in the work force at all by the Federal agency. The study said that most of these workers were to be found in the inner city.

"Perverse as it may be, the Statistics method of defining and measuring unemployment seems biased against those individuals and areas experiencing the highest incidence of unemployment," the study said.

"That is, those areas with high incidence of poverty, large minority population and a declining economic base, and those persons that are below average in income, unskilled and dependent or transient," the 112-page document said.

The study was commissioned by the city's Office of Manpower. Mary Canada, deputy director of the office, said it was the most extensive challenge to the Labor Department's monthly report. Department officials denied that the figures were inaccurate because of poor methodology.

Mrs. Canada said the city's only recourse was to consider legal action, but she hoped other cities would conduct similar studies to build a case.

Martin Ziegler, chief of local area unemployment statistics, speaking in support of current methods, said in a telephone interview from Washington that unemployment figures were becoming more important to city officials.

An Automatic Trigger

This is especially so under the new Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, which contains an automatic trigger to provide additional funds to areas where joblessness is 6.5 percent or more for three consecutive months.

"Unemployment figures were not that important during the categorical programs of the 1960's," Mr. Ziegler said. "Some funds were based on the figures, but they were small compared to the money under C.E.T.A."

STUDENTS IN RYE GET HEALTH TESTS

Smoking and Liquor Habits Also Are Compiled

Special to The New York Times

RYE, N.Y., March 23—Groups of seventh- and eighth-graders have been eagerly lining up at Rye Middle School this week to be weighed, measured, examined and tested.

They have answered questions about their smoking and drinking habits, and, with only slight reluctance, have relinquished samples of their blood.

"No one has even fainted," Deane Flood, the Middle School principal, noted as the health-screening program was winding up this afternoon. "It's turned out to be a dynamite idea."

The screening was a component of a chronic-disease prevention program developed by the American Health Foundation to test middle school pupils for risk factors, such as excessive smoking, hypertension, high cholesterol levels, obesity, alcoholism and inadequate exercise. If these risk factors are identified and controlled in childhood, the incidents of heart disease, cancer and stroke can be reduced in adulthood, according to Dr. Christine Williams of the foundation.

The screening program has included about 2,000 students in Intermediate Schools 17 and 70 in New York City, and Mamaroneck and Rye Middle Schools in Westchester County. In Mamaroneck, 85 percent of the 800 seventh- and eighth-graders volunteered, with their parents' consent, for the program, and about 350 of the 500 Rye Middle School students participated.

Although health education programs exist in all public schools, cigarette smoking and the use of alcohol are increasing, and poor nutritional habits continue, according to Dr. Williams. Risk factor screening, she noted, with a subsequent education program in each school, is an attempt to personalize present health programs by teaching children about their bodies and the consequence of their personal habits and lifestyles.

Children who indulge in high-fat foods, such as hamburgers, french fries and pizza, are likely to have a high cholesterol level, she said.

About a month after the screening, when all results have been returned, foundation representatives will meet with the children and their parents to explain the relationship between cholesterol and heart disease, and to suggest alternatives to fatty foods.

After the screening results have been returned, peer pressure antismoking campaigns will be conducted in each school, Dr. Williams said. The procedure, she explained, will be to encourage a nucleus of smokers, using a variety of techniques, to stop smoking. They, in turn, will help others to stop.

2 Correction Men Arrested

Two state correction officers at the Ossining Correctional Facility were arrested in separate incidents Friday. Lloyd Scantlebury, 50 years old, of 85 Taylor Street, Brooklyn, was charged with intoxicated driving. Carl Matthews, 29, of 145-14 South Road, Queens, was arrested on the complaint of a woman who accused him of attempted murder, robbery and impersonating a police officer in Jamaica, Queens.

Students Attend Classes in Court Here

By ARNOLD H. LUBASCH

Fifty high school students have learned a lesson about American justice by visiting a Federal appeals court here, listening to the arguments in an immigration case and writing their own decisions as if they were the judges in the dispute.

Much to their surprise, some of the students said when they returned to court last Friday, the Federal judges produced a decision that was more compassionate and less technical than many of the student-written decisions.

The unusual combination of classroom and courtroom began three weeks ago, when students from Martin Luther King Jr. High School on the West Side, the Dalton School on the East Side and John Dewey High School in Brooklyn visited the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit on Foley Square.

In greeting the students in court, Chief Judge Irving R. Kaufman told them that it was essential to understand "how our courts operate and how they strive to achieve their eternal goal of justice for all."

Married Before Arrival

The students listened intently in the dignified 17th-floor room as the opposing lawyers argued the case of a woman who was appealing a decision to deport her because she had violated a provision of the immigration law when she came to this country from the Dominican Republic at the age of 19.

Immigration officials decided to deport the young woman, Juana Estela Corniel-Rodriguez, because she was married three days before arriving here on a visa as the minor child of an alien who was living in the United States.

But her lawyer argued that she should not be deported, because the United States Consul in Santo Domingo had failed to warn her that the visa would automatically become invalid if she married before arriving here.

The three-judge panel—Chief Judge Kaufman, Judge J. Joseph Smith and Judge Robert P. Anderson — reserved the court's decision, and the students discussed the case with the lawyers before returning to class to ponder the legal issues.

Adage Is Stressed

At the Dalton School, more than two-thirds of the participating students decided that the woman should be deported, but most of the John Dewey students and two-thirds of the participants at Martin Luther King decided against deportation.

Justin Monjo, a Dalton student, wrote a decision stressing that ignorance of the law is no excuse" and declaring that the woman must be deported even though she broke the law accidentally.

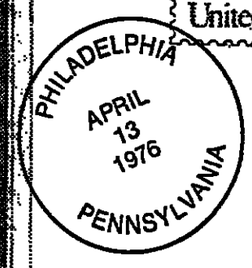
The Official First Day of Issue United States Currency



OFFICIAL FIRST DAY OF ISSUE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TWO-DOLLAR BILL
APRIL 13, 1976

(Illustration enlarged in conformity with Federal Law 18 U.S.C. 504.)

ON APRIL 13, 1976, THE UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT will release through the Federal Reserve Banks, our nation's new Thomas Jefferson/Declaration of Independence two-dollar bill. This new bill represents the first new design of U.S. currency in more than 40 years.

The face of the bill will contain an engraved portrait of Thomas Jefferson while the reverse side will display an engraving of The Signing of The Declaration of Independence.

So that families throughout our great nation may own a permanent commemoration of this historical event, The Columbia Mint—through the cooperation of The Treasury Department and The United States Postal Service—is making available the Official First Day of Issue Folio of the new United States Treasury two-dollar bill.

RARE OPPORTUNITY

Possession of a First Day of Issue of U.S. currency is a rare if not a once-in-a-lifetime occurrence. This will be the 1st Official First Day of Issue Certification of a United States currency ever available.

A limited number of mint condition two-dollar bills are available. The U.S. Postal Service in Philadelphia will hand stamp each folio with a specially prepared cancellation mark of April 13, 1976—the first day of issue of these bills. This official stamping will forever attest to the bill's status as a First Day of Issue of United States Currency. As illustrated, each bill will be affixed along with the new Independence Hall 13¢ postage stamp, to a handsome panel which may be framed or preserved for future generations.

LIMITED TIME OFFER

ACT NOW! To be sure of obtaining one of these significant and historic folios—mail the order form below, along with your remittance of $10 plus $2.13 for the currency and stamp before April 13th. There is a physical limitation on the number of certifications that can be made, therefore, you are urged to act at once. Orders will be handled on a first-come, first-served basis. Please note: this may be the only time in your life that you will have the opportunity to acquire an Official First Day of Issue Folio of United States Currency. So please act promptly. There is a limit of one First Day of Issue per person.

Environmental Groups Query U.S. Exemptions for 8 Steel Plants

By E. W. KEWWORTHY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 27—When the Environmental Protection Agency issued new regulations on March 15, limiting the pollutants that the iron and steel industry can dump in lakes and rivers, it exempted eight plants along a 24-mile stretch of the Mahoning River in Ohio.

The plants, owned by the United States Steel Corporation, the Republic Steel Corporation, and the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Company, are old and "economically marginal," the agency said, and application of the national regulations to them "might result in severe economic and employment disruptions."

After close study of the language of the exemption, environmental groups and the staff of the Senate Subcommittee on Environmental Pollution have raised questions about its legality, its practicality and the effect such a precedent will have on achieving the objectives of the 1972 Clean Water Act.

Staff Director Critical

The Natural Resources Defense Council charged that the environmental agency, by its exemption, "seemingly rewrote the 1972 Water Act" and had thereby "institutionalized the status quo" of steel mill pollution of the Mahoning River.

And Leon Billings, staff director of the Senate subcommittee, said the agency "has removed in the Mahoning Valley the minimum floor for effluent standards for the steel industry and, thereby, invited every source of pollution to seek a regional exception to the standards for its industrial category."

E.P.A. officials, justifying the exemption, emphasize the difficult position in which Russell E. Train, the agency administrator, found himself. An agency study based on data submitted by the three companies confirmed the companies' contentions that the old plants were economically marginal. When operating at peak level, they provide 24,500 jobs—15 percent of total employment and 20 percent of total payroll in the Youngstown-Warren-Niles area. The companies told the environmental agency that they would probably have to shut down, or greatly curtail, operations if required to meet the costs of pollution controls.

In this situation, the E.P.A. decided that the Mahoning plants should be exempted from meeting the nationwide effluent limitations for the steel industry based on installation by July 1977 of "the best practicable control technology currently available." This meant that the plants could continue to discharge into the Mahoning the amount of pollutants they are now dumping.

'Fishable-Swimmable'

On the other hand, the pollution agency ruled that the plants would be subject to the industry effluent limitations to be met by July 1983, to achieve the goal of "fishable-swimmable" waters.

When the E.P.A. issued its order two week ago, it noted that th law allowed the administrator to grant "relief" from the 1983 requirements through variances on "a case by case basis" if compliance was not within "the economic capability of the owner." This seemed to assure the three companies that they would also get a sympathetic hearing on any requested relief from the 1983 standards.

The E.P.A. order also said that the relief granted on meeting the 1977 water standards did not mean that the Mahoning plants would be exempted from meeting limitations on air pollution, which the plants are also violating. The cost of air pollution controls is roughly the same as those for water pollution.

In granting the exemption on water pollution, Mr. Train relied on the legal advice of Robert V. Zener, the pollution agency's general counsel. In a memorandum last December, Mr. Zener said:

Mill Closings Predicted

"I believe we could legally sustain a relaxation of the 1977 iron and steel regulations for these plants were the agency's economic analysis to indicate that unless the regulations were modified, mills in the region would close, resulting in unemployment and dislocation of the regional economy."

Mr. Zener cited, in support of his opinion, Section 304 of the 1972 act, which states that, in establishing the 1977 "best practicable technology" regulations, the agency should consider the "total cost of application of the technology in relation to the effluent reduction benefits to be obtained."

It is precisely here that the environmental lawyers raise the question of the legality of the exemption, or, at least, the question of executive revision of the law through regulations.

They insist that the section cited by Mr. Zener on cost-benefit considerations in requiring best practicable technology by 1977 referred to whole "categories or classes" of industry, and not to regional subcategories of antequated plants.

The environmental critics note that Senator Edmund S Muskie, Democrat of Maine, chairman of the Subcommittee on Environmental Pollution and principal author of the 1972 act, said in a floor speech on the conference report of the bill:

"The balancing test between total cost and effluent reduction benefits is intended to limit the application of technology only where the additional degree of effluent reduction is wholly out of proportion to the costs of achieving such marginal level of reduction for any clas or category of sources.

"The conferees agreed upon this limited cost-benefit analysis in order to maintain uniformity within a class or category of point sources subject to effluent limitations, and to avoid imposing on the administrator any requirement to consider the location of sources within a category or to determine the economic impact of controls on any individual plant in a single community."

Fear Over Losing Privileges Said to Have Hurt E.R.A. Vote

By WILL LISSNER

Fears that the equal rights amendment might take away privileges women now have and might force men and women to share public toilets were believed by opponents of the measure to have influenced their vote most during the last statewide election.

This was indicated in a sample survey carried out by the League of Women Voters of Erie County and reported Friday at the league's annual convention at the Statler Hilton Hotel in Buffalo.

The survey was designed and analyzed by Rebecca Gelman of the Statistical Science Division of the State University of New York at Buffalo and carried out by Erie County league members under the direction of Joan Photiadis and Paula Minkiei. They interviewed 622 selected registered voters in Erie County by telephone.

Vote on the Amendment

In Erie County, which includes Buffalo, the vote on the amendment was 99,144 yes, 170,679 no and 108,117 expressing no preference, according to the State Board of Elections. In the state the vote was 1,470,213 yes, 1,950,993 no and 1,039,863 expressing no preference.

"Forty-nine percent of the men who voted on the amendment supported it, while only 38 percent of the women who voted on it voted for E.R.A.," Miss Gelman reported. "The proportion of men favoring the E.R.A. did not vary with age. The female vote did show a statistically significant trend with age, the percentage favoring E.R.A. being higher among older women."

Only 32 percent of the women between the ages of 18 and 29 who voted favored the amendment. This percentage rose to 37 percent for the age group 30 to 59. Of women 60 and above who voted, 52 percent voted for the amendment.

Of the men who voted who were Roman Catholic, 59 percent supported E.R.A. But of the women who voted who were Catholic, only 32 percent favored it. Among non-Catholic male voters 43 percent favored it, but among non-Catholic female voters 53 percent did so. A month after the voting 43 percent of those who had not voted because they had no opinion had reached one and it favored the amendment, 5 to 20.

Apart from the public toilet and privileges issues, which were the very big issues, according to the respondents, other big issues included fear that women could be drafted and dislike of "women libbers"—advocates of women's liberation from discriminations.

in the House. And most Democrats consider him a distinct long-shot.

"The Republican leadership is out of touch with the people of New York State," Mr. Peyser tells audiences. "The extreme right is not going to win an election in New York State. It's like Ford versus Reagan. Let's get a moderate who is willing to relate to the people issues."

Against Buckley

And indeed, at the Colonie Mall, Mr. Peyser is encouraged by perhaps two dozen persons, many of them elderly, who said that they were not for Peyser but rather against Buckley.

"I'd like to see you beat Buckley," says Rose Honig, a retired chicken farmer. "I don't like his attitude." And Henry Smith, a hardware salesman, tells Mr. Peyser: "We'd like to shake up government a bit, wouldn't we? We need a few changes, starting with Mr. Buckley."

And although the Republican organization supports Mr. Buckley, Mr. Peyser has a long-time political patron who has as yet taken no position in the Senate campaign. He is Vice President Rockefeller, who with his family has contributed tens of thousands of dollars to Mr. Peyser's three Congressional campaigns, and whose brother David has contributed $1,000 to Mr. Peyser's Senate campaign. In addition, Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Buckley are old antagonists.

The Peyser-Rockefeller relationship began in 1968, when Mr. Peyser was Mayor of Irvington, and wrote unsolicited letters in praise of Mr. Rockefeller, then a Presidential candidate, to every delegate to the Republican National Convention.

The following year, he told Mr. Rockefeller, who was then Governor, that he planned to run for the House seat then held by Richard L. Ottinger. "I told him that I was sick of Dick Ottinger attacking Nelson Rockefeller every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. I said that I was going to run and that I was going to beat him."

The Governor's aides said that the Westchester County organization had its own candidate, but Mr. Peyser recalled that the Governor had interjected, "I don't think you understand—Peter Peyser is going to run, and we're going to help him." Mr. Ottinger withdrew in an unsuccessful campaign for the Senate, and Mr. Peyser won handily in the overwhelmingly Democratic district.

Mr. Rockefeller has said that his support of Mr. Peyser is contingent upon Mr. Buckley's support of President Ford in the Republican primaries. Mr. Buckley has thus far been neutral in the contest between Mr. Ford and Ronald Reagan, the conservative former Governor of California.

A Classic Mismatch

From a financial and organizational viewpoint, the Peyser-Buckley contest looks like a classic mismatch. Mr. Peyser has raised $52,000 as opposed to Mr. Buckley's $400,000. Unlike Mr. Peyser, the incumbent Senator has an advertising agency working on marketing strategy, campaign chairmen in each county, finance chairmen in each county, a headquarters office and a fistful of endorsements, including Nassau County Republican chairman Joseph M. Margiotta and George Clark Jr., the Brooklyn Republican chairman.

Mr. Peyser, on the other hand, has strong labor support, including endorsements by former Labor Secretary Peter J. Brennan, president of the Building and Construction Trades Council of Greater New York and the Uniformed Firefighters Association, both of whom endorsed Mr. Buckley in 1970.

Mr. Peyser showed surprising support, moreover, in a recent day-long visit to Albany, during which he met with groups of school administrators, dairy farmers, Republican women, Jewish organizations, and union business agents including representatives of sheet metal workers, bakers, carpenters, teachers, plumbers, and electricians.

"When I started running in 1969, all I knew about labor was that they were people on strike, holding picket signs," Mr. Peyser told a meeting of 28 building trades business representatives at the Albany Hyatt House, where he held most of his meetings. "In Washington I saw that labor was fighting for education, for welfare, for health legislation and for the good of most people."

"We're with you," said Don Funk, business agent for the Electrical Workers. "We're sure as hell not going to vote for Buckley."

At a meeting with 10 representatives of women's groups, Mr. Peyser distributed a flyer that said "Peyser voted for—Buckley voted against" and then listed "Equal Rights Amendment; H.E.W. appropriation for maternal and child health programs; Federal funds for therapeutic abortions; school lunch and nutrition act; women's, infants' and children's supplemental food programs."

'An Identity Crisis'

Mr. Peyser also got an impressive turnout of political reporters at an Albany news conference. "You're having an identity crisis," said Marc Lawrence of WGNA radio. "Why haven't the people of New York State heard of Peter Peyser?" The candidate replied that he was known in New York City, and had six months to become known upstate.

"Would you call yourself a liberal?" someone asked.

"No, I'd call myself a moderate," said Mr. Peyser, who previously ran with Conservative Party support and received a 36 rating from Americans for Democratic Action and a 50 rating from Americans for Constitutional Action.

Why was he running? "Buckley is so beatable," he said. "One of the very apparent things I've learned in my travels is the dissatisfaction of Republicans with Senator Buckley. They say, 'Thank God you're running.'"

Mr. Peyser's campaign is also the result of an agreement he made with his wife, Marguerite, a portrait artist, that he would either go up or out. Are there moments, however fleeting, when Mr. Peyser agrees with the experts, the professional politicians, who say that there is no way for him to defeat Mr. Buckley?

"I have never had a negative day," Mr. Peyser replied.

Bipartisan Group Urges Code of Ethics for Senate

WASHINGTON, March 26 (AP)—A bipartisan move was announced Friday to require the drafting of a code of ethics and conduct for Senators and Senate employees. It would cover such issues as conflicts of interest and use of personal funds, its sponsors said.

The resolution, which the sponsors said they planned to introduce next Tuesday, would direct the Senate Select Committee on Standards and Conduct to propose such a code by next Jan. 31.

The Crown Colony of Hong Kong

It is fitting that such exciting coins should come from Hong Kong, a place where ancient Chinese culture thrives in the midst of influences from almost everywhere else in the world.

Hong Kong actually comprises over two hundred small islands in the South China Sea (as well as a small part of the mainland of China). But it is one of the world's leading trade and financial centers. Over 4½ million people live there, most of them packed into Hong Kong island itself and Kowloon, on the mainland. Thousands of them—the "boat people"—live on the junks and sampans that cram every harbor and cove.

The "Year of the Dragon" gold coin

The coin for the Year of the Dragon is to be struck at the British Royal Mint in 22 carat gold. It is 28.4 mm in diameter, and weighs 15.98 gms. The face value is HK$1000.

The obverse carries the famous Machin portrait of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, while the reverse depicts the Dragon in a powerful and dramatic sculpture specially commissioned for this issue.

Proofs (which have a frosted relief on a mirror-finish background) are priced at $330, bright uncirculated coins at $225 (inclusive of postage, packing and insurance). Each coin comes in a special presentation case (proof cases are covered in fine red leather), with an accompanying leaflet explaining the significance of the animals of the calendar.

This is your opportunity to add a beautiful new coin to your collection. And to begin the acquisition of a series that will make numismatic history.

Democrats' Delegate Races Could Shift Power in State

By MAURICE CARROLL

In the Bronx, two prominent Puerto Rican politicians are matched against each other in a race to be delegates to the Democratic National Convention. In Rochester, the Mayor heads one slate, the Vice Mayor a second, and a well-regarded Assemblyman a third. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the former United States representative to the United Nations, is on the Bronx ballot against his old friend, Representative Jonathan Bingham.

Such examples are but a sampling of the complexities of the New York State political scene.

The primary election April 6 in New York will help to shape the nation's Presidential politics. But below the surface of the four-way races involving Jimmy Carter, Senator Henry M. Jackson, Representative Morris K. Udall and "uncommitted" delegate slates, the vote also will have a subtle effect upon the state's political structure.

Besides providing some signals for the political futures of statewide figures such as Governor Carey and Patrick J. Cunningham, the state Democratic chairman, the vote in New York's 39 districts will also test the prestige of a number of politicians.

But there are a handful of districts in which the delegate vote will measure more than simple vote-drawing power. Those are the places w here one politician of power or ambition is matched directly against another.

"If Herman Badillo wins, it's a Udall victory. If Ramon Velez wins, it's a Ramon Velez victory," chortled Ramon Velez, a City Councilman who builds his political base on a tightly structured antipoverty agency and rivals Representative Badillo for the leadership of the heavily Puerto Rican south Bronx.

A Victory and After

Mr. Velez, besides his cheerful assertion of a heads-I-win-tails-he-loses confrontation, seems to think he will win. And if he should, would he run against Mr. Badillo, or sponsor a candidate against Mr. Badillo, for the 22d District seat in Congress?

"This is just for the convention," Mr. Velez said expansively. "We are good personal friends. Congress is, of course, something else."

Mr. Badillo, who ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic nomination for Mayor in 1969 and 1973 and is thought to be developing similar twinges in anticipation of 1977, was more cautious in his Presidential prognostications.

"Velez? That's the Cunningham slate," he said. "Of course," he added, "the question is the turnout. A certain number of poverty workers will be coming out, no matter what."

Mr. Cunningham has encouraged uncommitted slates. Mr. Velez is heading an officially uncommitted one, but has personally endorsed Senator Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, who has not yet announced his candidacy.

In the 23d district next door to the Badillo-Velez confrontation, Mr. Moynihan has been substituted as head of the Jackson-for-President slate (Assemblyman Burton Hecht "walked the plank" to make way for him) to take advantage of the popularity among Jewish voters that he won with his anti-Arab speeches in the United Nations.

This pits him against Representative Bingham, head of the Udall ticket and an old friend of his, who reacted with rage to Mr. Moynihan's late arrival. But Mr. Bingham conceded that he felt Senator Jackson had more inherent strength in the area, observing, "We have a terrible problem from lack of money in getting Udall known, that his record on Israel, for instance, is wholly solid."

Moynihan Chances

A Moynihan victory would inevitably stir anew the speculation that he might have a chance to unseat Senator James L. Buckley, a Conservative-Republican, in November.

Mr. Bingham, one of a number of Congressmen who are putting their prestige on the line in the delegate races, is the only one to face an opponent of equal celebrity.

Also running as delegates are Representatives Otis Pike (uncommitted in the First District), Mario Biaggi (a Jackson delegate in the 10th), James H. Scheuera Jackson delegate in the 11th, merging with the forces of Meade Esposito, the Brooklyn leader, who originally fought Mr. Scheuera's invasion his district), John M. Murphy (a Jackson delegate in the 17th), Charles B. Rangel (a Udall delegate in the 19th), Bella S. Abzug (a Udall delegate in the 20th), Samuel S. Stratton (uncommitted but tacitly claimed by the Jackson backers in the 28th) James M. Hanley (uncommitted in the 32d), John J. LaFalce (uncommitted but favorable to Senator Humphrey in the 36th) and Henry J. Nowak (uncommitted in the 37th).

There are also interesting Democratic confrontations upstate.

In the 34th District, around Rochester, Mayor Thomas Ryan heads a Jackson slate, Vice Mayor Margaret Costanza heads a Carter slate and Assemblyman Thomas Frey heads a Udall slate.

In that race, while there are ideological elements (Mr. Frey is a liberal and Mayor Ryan tends towards conservatism) the major confrontation is personal. The mayor is elected by the City Council, and Vice Mayor Costanza thinks she should have gotten the job. She and Mayor Ryan do not like each other, and a victory for either slate would be looked upon as a piece of one-upsmanship over the other.

In the 33d District, around Syracuse, the Onandaga County leader, Thomas Lowery, has fashioned an "uncommitted" slate while the Mayor, Lee Alexander, heads a Jackson slate.

Syracuse politicians tend to downgrade the importance of that apparent conflict. "If Alexander wins, and Jackson wins, maybe Alexander goes to Washington," one knowledgeable Democrat suggested. "Alexander is an ambitious guy.

"And if Alexander loses," he added, "there'll be a little rhetoric the day after the election. But he'll still be the Mayor."

FORD SAYS NATION BACKS G.O.P AIMS

Calls Republican Principles 'Guideposts to Victory'

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

FRESNO, Calif., March 27—President Ford told Republican Party leaders here today that the nation was rallying behind traditional Republican principles that would be "guideposts to victory" in November.

In a luncheon speech to the State Central Committee of a party that Ronald Reagan led for eight years as Governor of California, the President said pointedly that he had been committed to Republican tenets for all his 27 years in public life.

Mr. Reagan, who was on his address a party meeting there, was a Democrat until he switched affiliation in the early 1960's.

The President made no mention of his rival for the Presidential nomination, but he asked indirectly for support in the June 8 California primary.

'Walk With Me'

"As you walk the precincts of this great state of California this year," he said, "I invite you and all Americans to walk with me on the path of peace, on the road to prosperity, on the way to victory in 1976."

Mr. Ford said that a victory over the Democrats this year would constitute an endorsement of the policies he has followed.

"It will be a mandate to continue the policies of economic stability and growth, of limited government, of fiscal restraint and tax relief which so many millions of Americans are demanding and to which our party has always been committed," he said.

At a Los Angeles dinner last night where 500 Republicans gave $1,000 each to his candidacy, Mr. Ford said that even Democratic Presidential aspirants were beginning to cling to "Republican values that I have always stood for and voted for."

Democrats Quoted

He quoted two of the Democrats, former Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia and Representative Morris R. Udall of Arizona, on recognizing widespread opposition to extravagant Federal programs.

"Some of us have been saying that for years," Mr. Ford said. "They seem to be a little slower getting the word, but better late than never."

No matter who the Democratic nominee is, Mr. Ford said, the Republicans will win "because we have had a lot more experience with and dedication to the ideas that they are now espousing."

Udall Defends Humphrey Against Carter

By CHARLES MOHR
Special to The New York Times

MADISON, Wis., March 27—Representative Morris K. Udall sought today to use against Jimmy Carter an attack by Mr. Carter on Senator Hubert H. Humphrey.

Mr. Udall, the Arizona Democrat who is seeking his party's Presidential nomination, called a statement by Mr. Carter, the former Governor of Georgia, a "lamentable lapse." He said it raised questions about Mr. Carter's behavior under pressure.

Humphrey Popularity

Mr. Carter, also a Presidential candidate was quoted in press accounts Thursday as having termed Senator Humphrey untruthful, too old and a man with a "loser's image." Mr. Carter also seemed to call Mr. Humphrey's honesty into question by raising such subjects as the conviction of a former Humphrey campaign manager for accepting illegal campaign contributions and allegations that Mr. Humphrey had received large sums of money from the reclusive industrialist Howard R. Hughes.

Mr. Carter's remarks had been touched off by an earlier statement by Senator Humphrey, a Minnesota Democrat, in which he said that those who campaign against Washington and Federal programs might be guilty of a form of concealed racism. Mr. Humphrey exempted Mr. Carter from his criticism.

Mr. Humphrey, who is an undeclared but available Presidential candidate, has a substantial degree of popularity in Wisconsin, which on April 6 holds a Presidential primary election that is vital to Mr. Udall. Udall supporters here hope that Mr. Carter's words will hurt him in Wisconsin.

A source in the Udall organization said that Senator Humphrey had authorized the Udall camp to use recordings made by Mr. Humphrey praising Mr. Udall's political positions and his character.

Mr. Udall is believed by many politicians to be trailing Mr. Carter in Wisconsin, but Udall partisans think that their candidate has begun to close the gap.

Frequent Theme

Mr. Udall's defense of Senator Humphrey and criticism of Mr. Carter fitted into a theme that Mr. Udall has used with increasing frequency in recent days.

As he told one labor audience sprinkled with Humphrey supporters, "If you are for Hubert Humphrey, then you better hope I win in Wisconsin because if I get knocked out of the race, one candidate is going to get momentum and there won't be any choice at the convention."

Mr. Udall also hopes to make political capital out of Mr. Carter's contention earlier this week that farm prices should be supported by the Federal Government at a level of only 80 percent of the parity formula.

Black Officials Here No Fervor for Can

By CHARLAYNE HUNTER

"None of us are really emotionally involved with any of our candidates," Representative Charles B. Rangel asserted. "We're committed, but it's with a small 'c.'"

Essentially, Mr. Rangel's attitude was similar to that of many blacks—elected officials and others—many of whom are listed on either the Jimmy Carter or Morris K. Udall lates in the Presidential primary in New York State on April 6 but some of whom appear as candidates on the slate of Henry M. Jackson.

Many black officials said that this lack of enthusiastic support for Presidential candidates was unusual in recent black politics.

"I don't think that George McGovern ever reached black folks with the antiwar thing," said Basil Patterson, who is vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee, "but four years ago we had Shirley Chisholm and the exuberance out of the black political convention at Gary. In 1968 we had a favorite, Humphrey against Nixon, and in '64 it was the monster we knew we had to defeat, Barry Goldwater."

This attitude, according to Mr. Rangel, the Manhattan Democrat, and others, "highlights the fact that none of the candidates are speaking to black issues." Or, if they are, many complained, they are "talking one way in black communities and another way in white communities."

Issues Often Stressed

Unemployment, the problems of urban areas and education were among the issues most frequently cited by these officials.

For example, Mr. Patterson said that the Boston ad in which Senator Jackson, of Washington, stated that among the Democratic candidates only he and Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama were against busing had irritated blacks "all over the country." He added, "It had nothing to do with black support of the concept of busing, but it is the issue of busing as a code word."

Mr. Patterson, who like others identified unemployment as the critical issue for blacks, said:

"They are talking about unemployment at a level of more than 6 percent until the end of the decade, which means black folks being out of work, black folks whose unemployment rates are more than double that now being out of work forever. But none of them is truly addressing that issue."

Representative Shirley Chisholm, the black Brooklyn Democrat who ran for President four years ago, complained that the candidates were being heavily influenced by the "rightist-conservative mood in the country as a matter political expediency."

These blacks and those running on slates explained in interviews that their principal role would be in "influencing and improving" their candidate's positions on those among other issues.

Two Candidates Cited

Thus far, the attitude of the some black elected officials, coupled with the disenchantment among some former delegates who were bumped from slates is expected to be a factor in what many believe will be a low voter turnout.

"Some of the people who lost out are the ones who really go out and get the vote," one Harlem business official said. "And that's going to hurt."

Despite the relative unenthusiasm toward the current candidates, however, there is an overwhelming sentiment among many black elected officials like Manhattan Borough President Percy Sutton and Mrs. Chisholm tha would change tion developer tion that off choices.

Jackson Says Carter Seeks To Excuse a Loss in State

By DOUGLAS E. KNEELAND
Special to The New York Times

BUFFALO, March 27—Senator Henry M. Jackson, in one of his strongest attacks on a rival for the Democratic Presidential nomination, accused Jimmy Carter today of "whining" and trying to find an excuse in advance for a potential loss in the April 6 New York State primary election.

At a news conference here early in a day-long upstate campaign swing that also took him to Rochester and Syracuse, the Washington Senator chided the former Governor of Georgia for his complaints i this area yesterday that the primary election process, in which a number of his delegate slates failed to qualify, was "stacked, undemocratic" and "disgraceful."

"I think that Coach Carter, frankly, is blaming the umpire before the game is oer," Mr. Jackson declared. "He is preparing himself for defeat in the nation's second-largest state on April 6."

Prospects in New York

Senator Jackson and his senior political adisers, although they expect to win a majority of New York's 274 Democratic delegates to next July's national convention, obviously have been somewhat concerned about the momentum Mr. Carter has built by successive victories in Florida, Illinois and North Carolina.

The Senator won in Massachusetts, finished a respectable third behind Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama in Florida, an ddid not actively compete in Illinois or North Carolina.

So the Jackson forces are contending that Mr. Carter has yet to demonstrate that he can win against his toughest competition in a Northern industrial state.

Although Mr. Carter has delegate slates in only 26 of the state's 39 Congressional Districts, as against 35 slates for Senator Jackson, he is expected to run best upstate, where he has concentrated his campaign.

There is no doubt that is Georgian the target of his attack today, virtually ignoring Representative Morris K. Udall of Arizona, who is considered to have a better chance of picking up some delegates in the more liberal districts in and around New York City.

"Mr. Carter talks about everything but what's really bothering the people," Mr. Jackson said at the news conference here after he toured the Broadway Market, a sprawling arcade in a Polish neighborhood. "What's really bothering the people is jobs. Here in Buffalo over 14 percent of the people are out of work and he goes around talking about his election chances. I don't think that goes over very well with the people of Erie County."

Noting that he had to win a court decision this week to keep 41 of his delegates on the ballot, Mr. Jackson said that he was "not going to whine about that."

"The man who is out of work," he went on, "has far more to whine about than Jimmy Carter and he's whinning about the problems he has to face as a politician.

"He isn't whining about the election laws. He's whining because he's going to lose in New York."

Later, he repeated his criticism of the Georgian in Rochester and Syracuse before returning to New York City for an evening rally at Manhattan Center in support of Soviet political prisoners.

Homosexuals Plan To Stage Protests At the Conventions

The National Coalition of Gay Activists is planning large-scale protests at the Democratic and Republican National Conventions this summer to demand the passage of legislation to prohibit discrimination in employment and housing against homosexuals.

Spokesmen for the organization said at a news conference at the Biltmore Hotel that the Gay Activists expected at least 20,000 people to demonstrate during the Democratic convention in New York and in Kansas City, Mo. during the Republican National Convention.

"We are the second largest minority in the country with 10 percent of the votes," a said Morty Manford, the Gay Activist president. "We will be in New York to remind the candidates and delegates of this and to make sure they know we are not going away."

The year-old organization has 300 members throughout the country who belong to other local groups and who will publicize in their cities the plans to attend the conventions, he said.

Mr. Manford said that his group planned to try to obtain a permit to allow demonstrators to camp out in Central Park and that it would ask the city to provide toilets and other facilities.

"We want this to be a nonviolent protest," he said, "and we are hoping the police will cooperate with us."

Last summer, 45,000 homosexuals took part in a Gay Pride march here, and a similar rally is planned for this June.

"There were 1,000 gay people in Miami in 1972," said John Paul Hudson, a coalition member. "New York is not so isolated geographically, and Kansas City is very accessible from both coasts. We expect an exceptionally large turnout of gay people at both conventions."

not apply until 1974 to corporations with Government contracts, most of the major ones —and little if any subsequent political activity appears to have resulted.

Corporations, generally, have had little experience with legal participation in campaigns and their illegal participation revealed in the Watergate scandals has tended to discourage them from taking advanfage of this new power.

But the unions, old hands at organizing support for candidates they favor, have made profitable use of this communicating power.

In the New Hampshire special senate election last September, the product of a virtual tie the year before, thousands of dollars of union money financed telephone banks and canvassing for John A. Durkin, the Democratic victor, all unreported and all outside the spending ceiling then in effect.

Similarly in a special New York house election this month, the New York State A.F.L.-C.I.O. and New York State United Teachers both sent computerized mailings and illustrated flyers to all their members in the 39th Congressional District.

Although the upstate district had not sent a Democrat to Washington since 1874, the Republican nominee, John T. Calkins, was defeated by Stanley N. Lundine, the Democratic Mayor of Jamestown, by 20,000 votes. The unions boasted they had spent $20,000, made 60,000 phone calls and distributed 50,000 pieces of literature.

Packwood Proposes Change

When the bill reconstituting the Federal Election Commission came up on the Senate floor this week, Republicans proposed an amendment that would require unions and corporations to report this "communications" spending to the commission, just as candidates, parties and private individuals all do.

In the ensuing debate, some Democratic liberal stalwarts found themselves arguing uncustomarily, that disclosure of campaign spending, the keystone of electoral reform by almost any standard, was an invasion of privacy when certain groups were affected.

Senator Alan Cranston, Democrat of California, called the requiring of such spending reports "a dangerous Federal intrusion into the internal affairs" of unions and corporations. "I see no reason why the costs of such internal communications are any business of the Federal government," he said.

But the amendment, sponsored by Senator Robert W. Packwood, Republican of Oregon, was approved, 59 to 42. Later, some Democrats attempted an intricate parliamentary maneuver to kill the Packwood amendment but retain all other changes made by the Senate. This aroused a mini-filibuster and failed.

Amendment Changed

When party leaders reached a compromise agreement on the campaign bill, it included a provision modifying the Packwood amendment so that no union or corporation would have to report an expenditure of less than $1,000 "in a calendar year with respect to a particular candidate."

But when Senator Cranston proposed this amendment with perhaps a half-dozen senators on the floor, it merely exempted from reporting communications "expenditures less than $1,000," with no reference to candidates or time periods.

As a result, under the Cranston proposal, labor could have made 10 or 20 daily mailings in behalf of the same candidate without reporting any of them, as long as each cost less than $1,000. A motion by Senator Packwood to table this amendment as creating a giant loophole failed, 49 to 36.

Then Senator Dale Bumpers, Democrat of Arkansas, proposed that the $1,000 floor on reporting apply "per candidate, per election," restoring the compromise agreement. Senator Cranston opposed this amendment, but it passed, 75 to 9.

The House version of the campaign bill does not include a requirement for reporting this political spending, an attempt to do so having been defeated in the House Administration Committee. The A.F.L.-C.I.O. is already on record as opposing a scheduled floor amendment similar to the Senate language.

Andrew J. Biemiller, legislative director of the labor federation, said it would oppose any amendment that required reports of "a variety of communications limited to members and stockholders."

"This amendment," the labor lobbyist said, "is aimed squarely at preventing local unions from exercising their rights under the 1971 act by burdening them with excessive filing requirements relating to minor costs."

both parties. Four years ago, there was only a pro-forma race among the Republicans, with President Nixon challenged in a few states by two little-known Representatives, Paul N. McCloskey Jr. of California and John N. Ashbrook of Ohio.

In general, Republican participation has been up sharply in most states.

In states where independents can vote in either Republican or Democratic primaries, however, more have chosen the Democratic side.

That, plus a Democratic registration edge in most of the states that have voted so far, accounts for the fact that 68 percent of the votes to date have been cast in Democratic primaries. According to a Gallup Poll last September, only 44 percent of the voters nationwide consider themselves members of the Democratic Party.

Increase in Massachusets

Of the five states where comparisons were possible, only Massachusetts showed an increase in voter participation. Despite a snowstorm across most of the state on the day the primary was held, the turnout there increased from 27.7 percent four years ago to 32.8 percent this year.

The addition of a Republican contest was one element in the increase. More important, the balloting came early this year, with interest increased by the fact that the race was in doubt; in 1972, there was no real opposition to Senator George McGovern of South Dakota in the Democratic primary.

The largest decline in the voter turnout this year came in North Carolina, where participation fell from 46.7 percent to 33.8 percent. In large measure, the drop resulted from a decision to hold the gubernatorial primary, which always arouses widespread interest, on a different date from the Presidential primary this year.

Elsewhere, the declines were modest. In New Hampshire, participation fell from 50.8 percent in 1972 to 48.5 this year; in Florida, from 56.3 percent to 54.1, and in Illinois, from 35.9 percent to 35.6.

No Pattern Found

States where former Gov. Ronal dReagan of California actively opposed President Ford include Florida, which voted heavily, and North Carolina, which did not.

However, the two states where most of the candidates made their heaviest investments of time, New Hampshire and Florida, produced the two highest rates of turnout.

Because many Americans never bother to register to vote, calculating turnout as a percentage of registration overstates the degree of citizen participation.

In North Carolina, for example, the voting age population is 4.2 million. The turnout for the primary was 794,958, which means that only 18 percent of those old enough to vote, fewer than one in five, actually voted.

...les disagree. A highly placed Washington Republican, who asked not to be identified, summed up their reaction by saying:

"They are just mad with the Cubans who, they insist, had let the President down."

While many Cubans have long opposed what they perceive as the President's policy of warmer relations with the Havana Government of Prime Minister Fidel Castro, local observers agree that the Ford campaign's leaders here have been less than diligent in presenting the Administration's view to the largely anti-Castro refugee community.

Moreover, the leaders of the Ford faction here, Jose M. Casanova, a banker and Commerce Department consultant, and Ricardo Nuñez, a wealthy businessman who is head of the United States Cuban refugee program, have been controversial for years.

Many Republicans have resented the fact that Mr. Casanova was elevated from political obscurity here four years ago by a friend of Charles G. Rebozo, former President Richard M. Nixon's confidant.

Mr. Nuñez, a personal friend of Mr. Casanova, has had many detractors, too. His appointment last year to the Federal job was described by a number of Cubans and Americans as an effort of the Administration to politicize the refugee program, which had been headed by nonpartisan professionals.

Dr. Penabaz, as well as other Cuban Republicans, had warned the White House about the adverse political consequences of the appointment of Mr. Nuñez, an informer for the Central Intelligence Agency and former vice president of Gramco, the now-defunct Bahamas-based investment fund of equivocal financial reputation.

Fund-Cutoff Threat Cited

Some Cuban-Americans resented what they regard as high-handedness of Ford campaign officials. Mr. Lacasa recalled that shortly after his support for Mr. Reagan became known, he received a telephone call from Washington and was "threatened" with a cutoff of Federal funds for his agency by an official whom he declined to identify.

Not only did Mr. Ford fare badly here, but the Casanova-Nuñez Republican faction also managed to elect only one of the 17 members who make up the Dade County Republican executive committee.

This could be seen clearly on Wednesday evening at the City Center 55th Street Theater, when "Pavanne" was seen, with Ann Marie de Angelo, making her New York debut in the title role, in juxtaposition with Mr. Joffrey's familiar choreographic essay in romantic nostalgia, "Pas des Déesses."

"Pavanne" is a kind of lyric poem in dance, a movement metaphor, of the most striking originality. Everything is to be found in its pungent simplicity, from its basic dance concept of a young Velázquez-like Infanta hemmed in by court protocol to its balancing of hard-edge lines of choreography with the soft undulating curves of the Ravel music.

This kind of work is something slightly different in the American repertory, and the Joffrey Ballet carries its differences off with style. Miss de Angelo, with doll-like looks and a fragile, fugitive style, was absolutely right as the entrapped Infanta, and this brief demonstration of choreographic miniaturism came off with flying colors.

This plodding manner proved especially surprising in the Couperin pieces, which Miss Rogell had aptly characterized as highly individual, graphically impressionistic works of intense emotional content. But "Les Barricades Mystérieuses," which is usually done either as a lively rondo or a mordantly witty sketch, became in Miss Rogell's version merely a glum recitation, lacking all tension. A Toccata in D minor by Ferdinand Tobias Richter was similarly drab, and a Purcell Suite in A minor had little rhythmic interest or sense of design.

Miss Rogell, one finally had to guess, is an artist whose work might be suited to a smaller room than Alice Tully Hall, where her conceptions might prove to have more nuance than one detected this time. Her harpischord, a large instrument of modern design without much resonance, was stylistically wrong for most of the music on this program, although her use of registers was restrained.

ThelioniousMonk Is in Fine Fettle With a Quintet

By JOHN S. WILSON

Thelonious Monk, whose melodies seemed strangely angular and lopsided to many jazz listeners in the 1940's, has since firmly established himself as one of the most distinctively original composers and pianists in jazz. Even more than in the case of Duke Ellington, from whom he is a musical descendant, Mr. Monk's tunes are immediately recognizable as his, and his style as a pianist is so personal that it is beyond imitation.

The charm of his tunes (which are now basics of the jazz repertory) and the fascination of his piano conceptions made his solo appearance at last summer's Newport Jazz Festival one of the high points of that event. And they provided a firm foundation for a concert at Carnegie Hall on Friday evening at which he performed with a quintet.

Mr. Monk, now looking like a biblical patriarch, as his beard has turned pepper and salt on his cheeks and gray below the chin, was in fine fettle as he reached into his huge bag of compositions for old, familiar pieces (because there is never a printed or spoken indication of titles, at a Monk concert, it is often difficult to remember which familiar title goes with which familiar tune) and for some seemingly new ones that showed the old familiar characterists.

But Mr. Monk's compositions seem to have a restricting influence on the horn men who play with him. Charlie Rouse, Mr. Monk's regular saxophonist in the 1960's, spent years plodding doggedly through his tunes in colorless fashion. Lonnie Hillyer, on trumpet, could get little more out of them on Friday evening, and Paul Jeffrey, who has played frequently with Mr. Monk in recent years, managed to lift his saxophone solos out of a tedious rut only by sudden bursts of physical energy.

Because both men took long solos on every number, even the solos by Mr. Monk and the occasional imaginative improvisations of Larry Ridley on bass were scarcely enough to balance the eventual sense of monotony that crept into the presentation. The fifth member of the group was Thelonious Monk Jr., who provided unobtrusive but steady support on drums.

Her Choreography Is Simply Too Much

By ANNA KISSELGOFF

Someone is always about to be throttled—usually from the rear—in Phobe Neville's dance pieces. She is an authentic Gothic spirit, with the wit to make the outrageous seem credible in her highly theatrical works. She is an original.

She can also be seen again this afternoon at the Riverside Church Theater, where the Phoebe Neville Dance Company showed off her work to such splendid and deadpan effect on Friday night.

Of course, this kind of choreographer—who is totally out of the mainstream—is not for the prosaic-minded. Miss Neville's most winning virtue is that she is simply too much. And the paradoxical delight of her achievement is that she becomes too much by using very little.

The formula of her pieces relies totally on a restricted range of movement that is usually reeled out very slowly. Nothing seems to be happening; there are no spectacular steps or leaps. And yet insidiously, the tensions mount and relationships among the characters onstage do develop. There is always a punch line or climax at the end, but it is never dropped like a bomb. It merely creeps up on us stealthily.

Thematically, Miss Neville seems concerned with the efforts of individuals to exert power over others. It is also typical of her that she leaves questions unanswered, implying unspeakable horrors to come after the curtain closes.

"Oracles," a static but fascinating piece, ends with a true menace of retribution. "Unamed," a premiere, skewed Miss Neville's tongue-in-cheek quality at its most overt by turning out to be a speeded up near-replica of "Cartouche," the dance before it on the program.

"Cartouche" perfectly sums up the monstrous relationship between a man and a woman. It began with John Dayger standing on the back of Miss Neville, who was prone on the floor. Slowly and suspensefully, the situation was reversed. Miss Neville knocked Mr. Dayger down in viselike clamp with her legs, crouched on his back and moved to choke him. The sharp linear and angular arm movements expressed everything while the grandeur of the accompanying Purcell music contributed some mock theatricality.

"Unamed," on the other hand, was performed to Bob Dylan's "Masters of War" with Mr. Dayger going through the same gestures in a business suit. Miss Neville wound up on top, but sat on his back with arms out like a vulture. It was only our knowledge that she had choked her partner in the Purcell version that suggested the next step to come.

"Mosaic," to which a repetitive score by Meredith Monk fits very well, was a more substantial premiere. Subtly and with economy of movement, Miss Neville created a portrait of four Bronte-like women. Again, one won out at the end—it was Miss Neville, who finally set the seal on her ascendancy by staring out of an empty picture frame. What happened to the others? One hung herself (Tryntje Shapli), and two otohers (Misses Pennison and Dumesnil) just pined away. Few have expressed states of emotion through stillness as brilliantly as Miss Neville.

Hamilton-Kirkland Ensemble Makes Its Local Debut with Sacred Works

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Hamilton-Kirkland Choir from Hamilton College and Kirkland College in Clinton, N.Y., made its New York debut at Town Hall on Friday night under the direction of Lee Spear.

The Hamilton men and Kirkland women make up an ensemble of more than 50 choristers. The thoroughness of their training was apparent as they performed an extensive and demanding program of sacred works from memory. Among the composers represented were Tallis, Gibbons, Purcell, Billings, Ives, Berkeley, Halsey Stevens and Randall Thompson.

Mr. Spear sought and achieved choral tone of remarkable smoothness and impersonality in which virtually every trace of vibrato and color had been eliminated from the individual voices.

The resultant tonal purity made for pitch security, clear diction and what might be described as a suitably "churchly" sound for the Renaissance motets.

But it also diminished the vitality and variety of the singing and tended to make one piece resemble both the previews one and the following one to a monotonous extent.

Brass Choir, conducted by Stephen Bonta, gave some rather rough performances of works by Gabrieli, Obrecht and Dukas, and an octet of singers called the Buffers offered an interlude of light music.

Opera: 'Aida' Is Recast

Caballe and Domingo Take Over Lead Roles in New Production at Met

By JOHN ROCKWELL

There are six principal singers in any cast of "Aida," and five of the six at the Metropolitan Opera Friday night were different from those in the premiere of the new production on Feb. 3. The only holdover was Richard T. Gill as the King; he was as solidly authritative as could have been wished.

The rest of the cast was pretty fine, as well, as long as allowances are made for peculiarities in the title role. Montserrat Caballé does not have the sort of soprano one normally associates with this part. Her voice is clear, slim and brightly focused, with an awkwardly managed break to a vestigal chest register.

On Friday, Miss Caballé chose to push herself to her limits. That meant some thrilling, dead-on-the-button forte high notes, cutting unnaturally through ensemble textures, along with some passionate, idiomatic phrasing. It also meant some laproached high pianissimos. Since her appearance and acting (Miss Caballé opts for Iberian Druidic in every part she portrays) didn't offer much, one was left with an interesting, sometimes thrilling, ultimately inappropriate vocal exercise.

Otherwise, the singing was extroverted and highly convincing in its unbuttoned way. Placido Domingo was in fine voice as Radames; enough said. Mignon Dunn, in her first Amneris of the season, poured out her voice in generous fashion. Louis Quilico, in his first Amonasro at the Met, offered a hairy barbarian of a characterization, with rough but stirring, huge-voiced singing to match. And Jerome Hines, towering grandly over the others, sang a firm, steady Ramfis.

This observer can't judge the new principals' fidelity to John Dexter's production, not having seen it before. Miss Caballé seemed pretty much in an orbit of her own, and the rest promenaded in stately wise, their hands crossed in neo-Egyptian ritual poses. The triumphal scene looks crowded and most of David Reppa's sets seem a bit tacky chi-chi; Peter J. Hall's costumes are spectacular; and James Levine's conducting blended controlled passion and lyricism in his best manner.

ARTS FUND DRIVE CALLED OFF BY CITY

A $7 million to $10 million emergency fund drive to support the city's crisis-ridden cultural institutions, publicly announced last December by Martin E. Segal, chairman of the city's Commission for Cultural Affairs, has been called off.

Instead, Mr. Segal explained in a memorandum addressed to trustees and officials of the institutions, the commission will try to raise money from foundations to support a public media campaign that would underscore the importance of government support on city, state and Federal levels. A pledge of $150,000 from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund for the original campaign was under discussion for this new purpose, he said.

The reason for halting the drive, Mr. Segal explained, is that a number of cultural organizations have started or are planning to start their own fund-raising efforts. "This is understandable, of course, in view of the specialized needs for which those fund-raising campaigns have already been or will soon be launched," he wrote.

Song Recital Given By Greg Johnson

Greg Johnson attempted to bridge the gap between popular and classical music in his song recital in Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday night. The idea was laudable, and it has been managed by some singers in the past. Mr. Johnson could not be added to that list.

He is a personable performer, who has studied at Augustana College, Columbia University and Union Theological Seminary here. His light bass voice was more than satisfactory for the long, long medley of musical-comedy songs with which he began the evening, but the singing was too well bred, bringing nothing special to the music.

On the other hand, when he attempted works by Peri, Mazzaferrat, Richard Strauss, Verdi and Mozart, Mr. Johnson was on safer ground stylistically. He knew what the music was about, but in this case his voice did not have enough solidity or range. The singer was well liked by the large audience, and perhaps there is some area where his talents might come into focus. Stanton Carter was the efficient pianist.

Simca Heled Gives Cello Recital

Simca Heled's biography in the program notes of yesterday's Coffee Concert at Alice Tully Hall referred to his "powerful charismatic temperament." No doubt. This observer felt more comfortable observing the scores of Mr. Heled's program than Mr. Heled himself, who squinches up his face in all sorts of pained and rhapsodic expressions, and spouts and wheezes besides.

That doesn't make him any less fine a cellist, however. Mr. Heled is principal cellist of the Israel Philharmonic and cellist of the Yuval Trio, and has a burgeoning solo career as well. His playing was full of temperament, powerfully charismatic or otherwise, with accurate pitch, generally rich tone and proper attention to both dramatic and lyrical kinds o fmusic. One's only complaint might have been about a tendency to raspiness and clattery noisiness in his bowing, but that was a minor matter.

The program lapsed over the scheduled hour but was still short, as is Kazuto Hillyer's intention at these pleasant coffee-and- doughnut affairs. The music included Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise Brillante, Schumann's Fantasy Pieces, Mendelssohn's cello-and-piano "Song Without Words" (Op. 109) and Brahms's Sonata in E minor (Op. 38). Jonathan Feldman was the ever-helpful pianist.

Rise in Visitors to U.S.

WASHINGTON, March 27 (AP)—The Government has reported that the nation's Bicentennial year started off with a 5.1 percent increase in the number of international visitors compared with the same month last year. It forecast on Thursday a total of 17.4 million international visitors for the year.

Two Vessels Make Maiden Voyages Here

By WERNER BAMBERGER

Maiden voyagees in the port are becoming less frequent as seaborne trade is conducted by modern and large ships. Two new vessels, the cruise liner Calypso and the automobile carrier Hoegh Trigger, are among the new. The Calypso is due here this afternoon to start a two-month series of cruises. The Hoegh Trigger arrived last week to deliver 2,400 Volkswagens.

Port Notes

The 604-foot Calypso, a Greek vessel owned by Ulysses Lines and operated here by Sovereign Holidays, is the former Southern Cross of the Shaw Savill Line. This British steamship, built in 1955 as a round-the-world tourist ship, was laid up in 1974.

She was given a multimillion-dollar rebuilding by her new owners in a Dutch shipyard and was transformed into a luxury cruise ship with accommodations for 732 passengers.

The Hoegh Trigger, a 615-foot Dutch-built motorship, with a capacity of 3,920 compact European cars, is one of the largest specialized carriers of her type in the world.

She flies the house flag of Hoegh-Ugland Auto Liners, a joint venture of two large Norwegian ship owners, who operate a fleet of 30 such carriers in worldwide service.

The HoeghTrigger arrived here Wednesday to discharge 1,200 Volkswagens at Port Newark after having stopped at Albany to discharge the same number of cars.

Before sailing from here to the Mediterranean, via Wilmington, Del., she took on 800 United States-built automobiles for delivery to Mediterranean and Mideastern ports. She was also due to take on more United States cars at Wilmington.

The Calypso is scheduled to make her maiden cruise out of the port on Tuesday afternoon bound for Bermuda with about 500 passengers.

The Brooklyn waterfront has regained its position as the port's largest employer of longshore labor.

The annual report of the Waterfront Commission of New York Harbor, made public earlier this month, showed that Brooklyn piers in the 1974-75 fiscal year accounted for 49.49 percent of all hirings in the port. The New Jersey piers, during the same period, accounted for 41.19 percent of all hirings.

The totals for the year were 1,187,064 hirings in Brooklyn and 987,889 hrings in New Jersey.

In 1972-73 Brooklyn accounted for 46.4 percent and New Jersey for 39.1 percent of portwide hirings. The following year it was 43.75 percent for New Jersey and 43.51 percent for Brooklyn.

There were 1,171,547 hirings in Brooklyn and 1,116,033 hirings in New Jersey in 1972-73, and 1,173,671 hirings in Brooklyn and 1,180,318 hirings in New Jersey in 1973-74.

Council Presses for Street-Drinking Ban

By GLENN FOWLER

A strong effort to override Mayor Beame's veto of a City Council bill that would ban drinking of alcoholic beverages on city streets was promised yesterday by Council members who had voted for the bill and by community groups that had supported it.

The Moyor's veto, his first since taking ofice 27 months ago, was exercised on grounds that the drinking ban would be largely unenforceable by a man-power-short police force, that attempts to enforce it might be applied unevenly against minority groups, that alcohol abuses were better controlled by treatment than by punitive measures and that existing laws were sufficient to control antisocial behavior that results from excessive drinking.

"We should have enough votes to erride," Councilman Theodore Silverman, a Democrat from the Flatbush section of Brooklyn and one of the bill's sponsors, said yesterday. "Many communities, including my own, expressed strong backing for the gill. We think the Mayor's reasons for vetoing it are not cogent."

"Problem Getting Worse"

Mr. Silverman was not on the Council floor on Feb. 24 when the bill was passed by a vote of 25 to 12 with four members absent and two not voting. A two-thirds vote is needed to override. The vote must be taken within 30 days frm from Tuesday, when the Council will formally receive the Mayor's veto message.

"This isn't the end of the fight," Jack Donnelly, a director of the East 84th Street Neighborhood Association, said in discussing plans of community organizations to press Council members to override the veto.

"The problem is getting worse," he said. Last Saturday night, 11 teen-age youths were arrested in Carl Schurz Park, in which Gracie Mansion, the Mayor's residence, is situated.

"They were so drunk that some of them had to be carried out," said Mr. Donnelly, who is an executive-committee-member of the Friends of Carl Schurz Park, one of 25 neighborhood groups and block associations that make up the Yorkville Alliance, a strong supporter of the drinking ban.

Referring to assertions by opponents that the bill was directed primarily at Puerto Ricans and blacks, in whose neighborhoods street drinking is more prevalent than in other parts of the city, Mr. Donnelly said:

"These kids were typical of the street drinkers in our area —members of white, middle-class families. You can find thm all the time in the park, drinking their Boone's Farm booze and taking 'downers' and other drugs."

Minorities Oppose Bill

Councilman Ramon S. Velez, who represents a predominantly Puerto Rican area in the South Bronx and who voted the bill, said yesterday that the minority hoped to change the minds of some Council members who had voted for the measure.

"The police have a lot more important things to do than stopping a poor guy from drinking beer—their time is better spent stopping the drug traffic and cigarette smuggling," Mr. Velez said. "We don't have enough jails to hold all the people who could be arrested for taking a drink on the street."

The drinking problem should be handled through education, "and not by prosecuting the poor," he added. "If middle-class parents don't want their kids to drink in public, they should teach them not to."

'Not a Racial Issue'

Backers of the bill insisted, however, that its purpose was "certainly not to have the police go after anyone with a can of beer in his hand," as Felicitas Anderson of the West 92d Street Block Association put it.

"We want protection against intolerable situations, like the group of men who hang out on Broadway and 92d Street every evening, harassing and threatening people who pass by," she said. "It's not a racial issue. The Spanish-speaking people in our neighborhood want to get rid of these 'Bowery' drunks just as much as everyone else does."

Organizations dealing with alcoholism are among opponents of the bill, which make public drinking punishable by a $10 fine, but would permit drinks to be consumed at block parties and street festivals and would not prevent anyone from drinking on the street in front of his own place of residence.

New State Law Cited

James C. Rice, administrative director of the Manhattan Bowery Project, testified at the Mayor's public hearing before the veto that, ironically, a new state law effective last Jan. 1 decriminalized public intoxication, providing for intoxicated persons to be sent home or to hospitals or other receiving stations.

The city bill, Mr. Rice said, constituted a threat to the individual freedom of alcoholics, who should be treated as sick persons, not criminals.

Mr. Beame, in his veto message, objected that the bill did not distinguish between peaceful and disruptive behavior, "thus exposing the householder enjoying a beer after a day's work and the unruly, antisocial person to the same criminal sanction. . . The distance of a few feet—from yard to public thoroughfare — could turn a harmless practice associated with a backyard barbecue into an act carrying a penalty under law."

Defect in Bill Noted

The Mayor also noted that the Council had failed to define alcoholic beverages, which could render the ban unenforceable.

To this, Councilman Silverman replied: "The Mayor's been around long enough to know that defects such as these are easily corrected by amendment." Mr. Silverman said that a similar corrective step could be taken to remedy the apparent "front stoop" contradiction in the bill.

Under the measure, street drinking would be legal only at licensed block parties and festivals and in front of one's own residence. This, said Mr. Beame, "would presumably allow a group of unruly residents to drink publicly in front of their dwelling place while prohibiting the same activity to a peaceful group consisting of one resident and his guests and companions."

WELFARE COSTS DECRIED BY CASO

He Calls Medicaid Program Major Cause of Rise

By ROY R. SILVER
Special to The New York Times

MINEOLA, L. I., March 27—Declaring that welfare and medical assistance costs mandated by the higher levels of government "are driving their counties to the verge of bankruptcy," Ralph G. Caso, the Nassau County Executive, said that Nassau's expenditures for health services increased by 5,500 percent between 1950 and 1974.

Mr. Caso, who with other members of the State County Executives Association, will meet Tuesday in the White House with James Cannon, director of the President's Domestic Council, said the major increase was a result of the Medicaid program started in 1967.

"In this area, Medicaid expenditures more than doubled between 1970 and 1974, despite a decrease of 22 percent in the number of eligible clients during this period," Mr. Caso said.

U.S. Urged to Act

Mr. Caso, who has advocated that the Federal Government take over the costs of welfare services, will present figures developed in a preliminary analysis of Nassau's expenditures for personal health services over a 24-year period prepared by the county's Community Medical Services Committee.

"The two major health insurance programs for the aged, disabled and needy, Medicare and Medicaid, are out of control," Mr. Caso said. "They are running at a pace far beyond the ability of our taxpayers to finance and we at the local level are totally at the mercy of our state and Federal governments for help."

He added that "one only has to look at total Federal, state and local outlays for the two programs to realize that we have a runaway on our hands." He noted that the total cost will be near the $40 billion mark in 1977, compared with $5.8 billion in 1967.

Gross county expenditures increased from $3 million in 1950 to more than $168 million in 1974, Mr. Caso said. In the same period, he added, the net cost to county taxpayers rose from $2.2 million to $69 million.

The County Executive said the cost of medical care services through government "increased far in excess" of the increases in the general Consumer Price Index for the New York area.

And, Mr. Caso added, "Net county costs have risen sharply in recent years, despite sharply increased revenues from Federal and state agencies."

Welfare Costs Noted

Between 1957 and 1974, gross expenditures more than quadrupled—from $39 million to $168 million, Mr. Caso said. The sharpest increase, he noted, was in the area of welfare, where medical assistance costs rose from $16 million in 1967 to $110 million last year.

Expenditures for health services rose from 14 percent of Nassau's total county expenditures in 1965 to 30 percent in 1974, Mr. Caso said, raising the per capita cost for health services from $14.49 in 1956 to $70.71 in 1974.

The State County Executives Association, which has 16 members, has taken a position that it will not provide any more funds for welfare in the county's budgets for 1977 than were appropriated this year.

In addition, since the costs of welfare services are mandated—50 percent from the Federal Government and 25 percent each from the state and county governments—the association has said that if its position is challenged in the courts it will not increase property taxes to meet the higher costs, but it would instead cut services and programs.

City Council Schedules 3 Committee Meetings

The City Council will meet at City Hall on Tuesday at noon. It has also scheduled three committee meetings during the week, as follows:

TUESDAY—Committee on Finance will be briefed by members of the State Emergency Financial Control Board, 8:30 A.M. at City Hall.

THURSDAY — Committee on Civil Service and Labor will conider bills that would prohibit the Civil Service Commission from inquiring into the past health history of job applicants and would call on the state to extend the life of all Civil Service lists while the city's hiring freeze is in effect. 10 A.M. at City Hall.

FRIDAY—Committee on Consumer Affairs will consider several bills including one requiring promoters of shows and exhibitions to post performance bonds so that refunds would be available to ticket buyers turned away from oversold events. 10 A.M. in the 23d-floor hearing room at 250 Broadway.

Prostitutes to Be Jailed

FAIRBANKS, Alaska, March 27 (AP)—The Fairbanks City Council has approved a measure requiring a mandatory jail sentence of 60 days for persons convicted of prostitution in this pipeline boom town. The new ordinance ruled out a suspended sentence, probation or parole until the term is served.

Smith Gets 25 Years in Slaying

A man who successfully fought attempts to remove a bullet from his shoulder as evidence in the killing of a policeman has been sentenced to 25 years to life in the murder. Justice Peter T. Farrell passed the sentence in State Supreme Court Friday after the defendant, John Smith, 28 years old, a former boxer, delivered a two-hour monologue in which he asserted that he was being "railroaded." Mr. Smith was convicted last Feb. 26 after a three-week jury trial of fatally shooting Lieut. Henry O. Schmiemann on June 20, 1074, in a robbery attempt as he walked in civilian clothes from his home in Middle Village, Queens.

Hearings Slated on City Action

Hearings will begin April 26 on Social Security coverage issues in the wake of New York City's pullout notice, according to the House Ways and Means Committee's Social Security Subcommittee. In a statement, the panel said the subcommittee chairman, James A. Burke, Democrat of Massachusetts, was particularly concerned over the action initiated by New York City "in taking the first step to deprive its city employees of vital retirement, survivor, disability and health insurance protection under the Social Security program."

Carey Names Energy Research Chief

Governor Carey yesterday appointed a physicist, N. Richard Werthamer, as the $47,800-a-year chairman of the New York State Energy Research and Development Authority. Mr. Carey also announced the appointment of David Sive as a nonsalaried member of the authority's Board.

Mr. Werthamer is a former president of Citizens for Clean Air and for 13 years was a researcher at Bell Laboratories. Mr. Sive is vice chairman of the Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference and is active in many environmental organizations.

2 Guns Held as Evidence Stolen

Two guns being held as evidence in the killing of a policeman have been stolen from the Manhattan District Attorney's office. John Keenan, chief assistant to District Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau said the guns were taken some time between Thursday afternoon and Friday morning. One missing gun belonged to Police Officer Michael McConnon, 27 years old, who was fatally shot Jan. 3, 1975, while interrupting a $20,000 bank robbery near Gramercy Park. The other belong to a guard of the bank and apparently had been taken from him by one of the robbers.

Washington Heights Fire Kills 2

Two persons were killed when a single alarm fire swept the third and fourth floors of a six-story tenement in the Washington Heights section of Manhattan, authorities reported. The victims of the blaze at 465 West 157 Street, were not immediately identified, the police said. They were described only as a male and femal who were found dead on the third floor.

20 Freight Cars Derail Upstate

A broken wheel apparently caused the derailment near Rome, N. Y., of 20 Penn Central freight cars loaded with new automobiles, railroad officials said. The cars, part of a 51-car train headed for Weehawken, N. J., left the track in an isolated wooded. There were no reported injuries.

Half-Fare Jersey-Bus Program

Transport of New Jersey will begin participating tomorrow in a half-fare program for elderly and handicapped persons riding on interstate routes. The company, the largest bus carrier in the state, said it would be the first concern in New Jersey to join the state-subsidized plan. The interstate half-fare program will be open to both residents and nonresidents of New Jersey. Elderly persons and the handicapped wanting to take part in the program must obtain an identity card from any New Jersey bank. The card will certify that the person is handicapped or over 62 years of age.

He completed his graduate studies and then traveled and studied in France and Germany. In 1923 he returned to China, with a Ph.D. in philology from Leipzig University, to become professor of English philology at Peking National University. But three years later he was forced, along with other alleged "radical" professors, to leave the capital.

He moved to Amoy University in the south of China to become dean of the institution's Arts College.

Founded Humor Magazine

Active in inaugurating reforms of old methods, and thoughts there, he attracted attention in the Wuhan Government. In 1927, he left the classrooms forever and became Secretary of the Foreign Affairs Ministry of the Wuhan Government. When a split developed in that regime in 1927, he left politics and devoted himself exclusively to creative writing.

Three years later he joined the Academia Sinica (a research academy) as foreign language editor and research fellow in philology. He contributed to a number of Chinese publications. These efforts were collected under the titles "Philological Essays" and "Critical Essays."

He was the inventor of an index system for Chinese characters and aided in formulation of a Romanization system of written Chinese. In the same period he founded and edited The Analects Fortnightly, the first humor magazine ever to appear in China.

Dr. Lin returned to the United States in 1935 with the manuscript of "My Country and My People." Then followed "The Importance of Living" (1937); "Wisdom of Confucius" (1938); "Moment in Peking" (1939); "With Love and Irony" (1940) "A Leaf in the Storm" (1941); "Wisdom of China and India" (1942); "Between Tears and Laughter" (1943); "The Vigil of a Nation" (1945); "Wisdom of Laotse" and "Chinatown Family" (1948).

Also, "Wisdom of China" (1949); "Peace Is in the Heart" (1950); "On the Wisdom of America" (1950); "Widow, Nun and Courtesan" (1951); "Famous Chinese Short Stories" (1952); "The Vermilion Gate" (1953); "The Unexpected Island" (1955); "Lady Wu" (1956); "The Secret Name" (1959); "From Pagan to Christian" (1960).

During World War II, Dr. Lin devoted much time to United China Relief. In the postwar years, he wrote and lectured about the dangers of Communist growth.

In 1972, he told a New York Times correspondent in Hong Kong that he considered his dictionary the "crown" but not the end of his career. "When I retire at 80," he said, "one of the things I want to do is improve my calligraphy"—the brush writing of Chinese characters regarded by Dr. Lin and generations of his countrymen as China's highest art form.

Dr. Lin, who lived with his family in the United States from 1936 to 1966, was married in 1919 and spent his honeymoon in New York City, which he came to regard as a second home.

He is survived by his wife and two daughters.

Memorial Service Today For Eric Siday, Composer

A memorial service for Eric Siday, a composer of electronic music and the bubbling tune for the Maxwell House coffee pot, will be held at noon today at the Riverside Memorial Chapel.

Mr. Siday, who lived at 390 West End Avenue, died Thursday. He was 71 years old.

An obituary yesterday in The New York Times incorrectly stated that Mr. Siday composed the jingle "Pepsi-Cola hits the spot." That jingle was composed by the late Austen Croom-Johnson in conjunction with Alan Kent.

Specs O'Keefe, Informant In Brink's Robbery, Dies

LOS ANGELES, March 27 (AP) — Joseph J. (Specs) O'Keefe, who led the Federal Bureau of Investigation to the other members of the gang in the widely publicized 1950 Brink's robbery in Boston, has died in a West Coast hospital under a false name. He was 67 years old.

Richard Bower, agent in charge of the F.B.I. office in Los Angeles, said Mr. O'Keefe died last Wednesday, but declined to say where he died or give any other details.

Biggest Cash Robbery

Shortly after 7 P.M. on Jan. 17, 1950, a truck with seven men wearing Navy pea jackets, chauffeur's caps and crepe-sole shoes drove from the Roxbury section Boston's North End and parked alongside the three-story building of the Brink's armored car company.

Across the street, a flashlight blinked on and off, signaling that the start of the biggest cash robbery in the country's history.

The men quickly crossed through a playground behind the Brink's building to the front door, which they opened with a key. For almost two years, they had planned the operation. They had been in and out of the building several times and had keys for every lock.

The men started up a flight of stairs, slipping Halloween masks, over their faces and passing through several more locked doors.

Five Brink's employees were in a caged room, counting money. The robbers, each with a gun, ordered the employees to open the cage and lie face down on the floor.

Within about 10 minutes, the seven men loaded $1,218,211 in cash and $1,557,000 in money orders into canvas bags and fled.

By the time the employees had freed themselves from ropes and mouth tapes, the robbers had returned to Roxbury, and one of the most celebrated and intensive criminal investigations ever undertaken was under way.

The precision and speed of the robbery stunned law-enforcement officials. The five Brink's employees could not even agree on how many robbers there were.

In the first weeks after the robbery, the F.B.I., the Boston police and the Massachusetts State Police accused one another of withholding leads.

One of the first persons with an extensive criminal record to be questioned was Specs O'Keefe, who had had numerous convictions, several for holding up bookmakers and crap games. He said he had spent the day drinking in a CopelySquare bar and had learned of the Brink's robbery over the radio. He was released.

Several months after the robbery, two small boys from Somerville, Mass., five miles north of the Brink's building, found two guns on a beach. Their fathers threw the weapons into the garbage. One firearm was apparently lost forever, while the other was discovered by a local policeman. It was one of the weapons stolen from a Brink's guard.

A month later, the parts of the truck used in the robbery was found in a junk yard.

Through one of its informants, the F.B.I. learned that $70,000 was hidden in an overstuffed chair in the home of Mr. O'Keefe's sister. Rather than arrest him, the F.B.I. waited, hoping to learn the identity of the other gang members.

Six months after the robbery, the F.B.I. got the break it was looking for when Mr. O'Keefe was arrested by the Pennsylvania State Police for speeding.

Inside the car were five guns and another Boston hoodlum with a long criminal record, Stanley Gusciora. The men were tried and convicted of firearms violations and sent to prison.

Then, the pieces fell into place. Mr. Gusciora's brother lived in Stoughton, Mass., next to the junk yard where the cut-up truck was found.

10 Were Involved

While in jail, Mr. O'Keefe decided to confess to the robbery and implicate all the others involved, almost six years after the robbery and days before the statute of limitations for the crime was due to expire.

All told, 10 men were involved. Two died before coming to trial, and the others, except Mr. O'Keefe, were sentenced to life imprisonment. Almost $1 million of the loot was never recovered.

Mr. O'Keefe was released from jail in 1966 and assumed a new identity, presumably under the protection of the F.B.I.

Scientists Discover Wreck of Ironclad Sunk in Civil War

Special to The New York Times

HOUSTON, March 27—With the help of a magnetometer, which helps scientists measure the fluctuation in the earth's magnetic field, a group of amateur explorers has located the wreck of a United States naval vessel sunk 113 years ago during the Civil War in the Gulf of Mexico.

The vessel, the ironclad Hatteras, a converted sidewheel merchant vessel that was sunk in a 13-minute battle with the Confederate ship Alabama, was found in January, and the divers brought to the surface a number of items, including the manufacturer's name plate, to verify its identity.

According to Dr. Frank E. Vandiver, a professor of history at Rice University who is a Civil War expert, the Hatteras is the first ship to be found that was sunk by another naval vessel during the Civil War. He added that the Hatteras was sunk rapidly without extensive damage and with all stores still aboard, including an arsenal of small arms and the ship's cash box, which is believed to have contained $3,000 in coins.

Because of the possibility of theft, the discoverers have refused to disclose the exact location of the ship. The team will rely on instruments to locate the ship again.

Dr. Paul A. Cloutier, associate professor of space, civics and astronomy at Rice, who is an expert in the use of magnetometers, and Charles A. Rose and Jeff Burke, aviators, searched for four years for the Hatteras. Mr. Rose was the first to see the ship, which is sunk in the soft and sandy bottom of the Gulf 60 feet below the surface.

Dr. Cloutier said it was too early to tell if the vessel could be brought to the surface, which would be an expensive undertaking. The Smithsonian Institution and the National Geographic Society will be notified of the discovery and the two organizations may help to salver the ship, Dr. Vandiver said.

POLL SAYS MAJORITY EXPECT GOOD TIMES

ANN ARBOR, Mich., March 27 (AP) — For the first time since late 1972, more consumers are expecting good times than bad in the year ahead, the latest University of Michigan Survey of Consumer Attitudes shows.

The university's Survey Research Center's Index of Consumer Sentiment shows 47 percent of those surveyed are expecting good times in the upcoming months, while 29 percent are expecting bad times. The rest had no opinion or no comment.

The accelerated consumer confidence in the economy indicates a return to pre-recession buying patterns, the survey reports.

The index showed a substantial gain in consumer confidence from November 1975 to February 1976 after showing no gain at all during the previous three months.

The index registered 84.5 in the latest quarter, up 9.1 points. The index has now recovered all but six points of the nearly 35-point decline reported during 1973-74. The survey measures confidence compared with a February 1966 base period that is equal to 100.

Concorde Flights to U.S. Opposed in Federal Court

WASHINGTON, March 26 (AP)—The Transportation Secretary's order allowing limited flight of the Concorde supersonic jet should be reversed because he failed to consider the safety of the aircraft and his decision did not comply with United States environmental procedures, a group of Concorde opponents contended Friday.

The comments were made as the group filed briefs with the United States Court of Appeals here in an attempt to overturn the action by the Secretary, William T. Coleman Jr., to allow up to 16 months of Concorde flights into United States airports in New York and near Washington. The suit was filed by the Environmental Defense Fund.

Sylvia Miles Doesn't Attend Every Party—She Just Seems

By JUDY KLEMESRUD

It seems as if she is always there, at all of the openings and the parties and the screenings, her thick streaked blond lion's mane slightly disheveled, her dresses cut low, a handsome young escort at her side.

"There's Sylvia!" the paparazzi shout at the sight of her. She flashes an enormous smile for them, and sometimes even strikes a rather dramatic pose. Snap, snap, snap go the Nikons.

She is Sylvia Miles, the actress, and she is also, according to many observers of the night life scene, Manhattan's No. 1 partygoer.

It is not as though she has nothing else to do. Miss Miles, who is somewhere in her forties, is a character actress who was nominated for best supporting actress this year for her role as the drunken widow in "Farewell, My Lovely." (She has cleared a place on her mantel for the Oscar, should she win it tomorrow night.) She was also nominated in the same category in 1970 for her role as the dog-walking hooker in "Midnight Cowboy," and she has had a slew of acting roles in between.

Must Know the Hosts

So why does she go, go, go to all of these affairs?

"I don't go to them all," she said somewhat defensively as she sat in her cramped, $360-a-month studio apartment on Central Park South, filled with pictures, posters and plaques celebrating her acting career. "I only go if I know the people who are giving it. If I went to every party I got invited to, I'd be dead."

"But you know," she added, somewhat disbelievingly, in a voice tinged with laryngitis, "it's gotten so people that I don't even know call me up or send telegrams asking me to parties. They'll say, 'Will you come?' and I'll say, 'I'll try.' Then if I don't come, I get panned for not showing up. Or else people will say I was there when I wasn't. It's unbelievable!"

Miss Miles, who was wearing a golden star with the word "Super" on it around her neck, picked up a brown calendar datebook in which she had neatly arranged her party invitations according to their date.

The datebook showed that in a typical week, Miss Miles had accepted invitations to a book publication party at the Rizzoli bookstore, the Ike and Tina Turner opening at the Empire Room, a screening of the film "Man in a Glass Booth," a rock mass at the Central Synagogue, and a screening of the film "The Duchess and the Dirtwater Fox," followed by a dinner party at the Landmark Tavern at which George Segal, the film's star, served as the host.

20 Party Dresses

For all these activities, Miss Miles maintains a wardrobe of about 20 party costumes that she keeps switching around "because I'm always being photographed." She also has a pool of "five or six" escorts to take her to the parties. They include an artist, a writer and a stock broker, the thrice-divorced actress said, "but no actors—I can't stand actors."

Does Miss Miles think that her reputation as a woman-about-town has hurt her career in any way?

"Yes, I do," she replied, between sips of apple cider. "There are a lot of things I don't get invited to that I should get invited to, like Council on the Arts things, because my theatrical friends see I'm photographed here and there, and they don't take me seriously.

"And then, of course, people like John Simon use my reputation as a partygoer against me. When he reviewed a play of mine, 'Nellie Toole & Co.,' he referred to me as New York's party gal and gate crasher. 'Well, I never go to parties that I'm not invited to.'"

Miss Miles got her revenge shortly threafter—at a party, naturally. She dumped a plate of food ("Nobody's ever gotten it straight; it was quiche Lorraine, steak tatare, potato salad and brie cheese") over Mr. Simon's head at a dinner party at the Ginger Man during the 1973 New York Film Festival.

'I'm Terrific Fun'

When asked why she thinks she is a major fixture on the Manhattan party circuit, Miss Miles smiled and said: "It would be immodest to say I'm terrific fun, but I am—I have a good time."

One observer of the social scene said that Miss Miles was rarely invited to "the big classy events where there are society and big-money types."

Such a charge makes Miss Miles fume. "I always get invited to those things, those charity balls," she insisted. "I am invited to most everything kind of snappy, you know, the 400. But I mean, why would I go to the April in Paris ball? It has nothing to do with my life. I am not a social figure, I am an actress."

By RUTH ROBINSON

The name for Slithy Toves, the shop Lynda Greenberg and Cynthia Stamm opened recently at 49 West 72d Street, is from Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass." It's a friendly place that sells children's clothes that have bright colors and a certain degree of sophistication. There are always cookies within reach of small hands and a copy of the sequel to "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" on hand open at "Jabberwocky," the poem that begins

'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogoves,
And the mome raths outgrabe.

Cheery reds, yellows and even oranges are preferred over so-called baby blue and pink for infants here and youngsters get into the ethnic look early with Mexican shirts and dimunitive Guatemalan tops of blue cotton with embroidered yokes. There are also things like empire jumpers in apricot ("a forward looking color for kids," according to Miss Greenberg), Oshkosh overalls, jumpers and jumpsuits; a goodly assortment of jeans and amusing tickling jumpers with a red hand and the word "stop" appliqued upside down for the wearer's edification.

Slithy Toves also has toys such as stuffed Noah's arks and wooden trains with engines pulling numbers or letters on wheels. Prices go from $2 for a toy iron filled with tiny ceramic pots in lieu of coals to $20 for sweaters made by Mary Beth Hartman, a neighborhood knitter. The current size range of 0 to 6X will gradually be expanded to accommodate larger children.

The embroidery may be Chinese, but the styling of the cotton tops Pumfins offers for spring is as American as apple pie. Joan Culkin, a designer with an interest in hand work and a talent for improvisation, has used imported table cloths and pillow cases instead of yard goods for the versatile garments. It's the kind of offbeat adaptation expected of her since her first design for the firm two years ago—lace collar mad kerchief.

Future Social Events

By RUSSELL EDWARDS

Tickets to the following events may be obtained from the beneficiaries unless otherwise indicated:

'O, Celeste . . .'

April 3—The Metropolitan Opera Club was started in 1899 by two cosmopolitan gentlemen who deplored New York's dearth of suitable after-theater clubs. Club members will hold their 16th annual benefit Ball in the Metropolitan Opera House. After a performance of "Aïda" with Montserrat Caballé and James McCracken as the finally asphyxiated lovers (yet how their notes can soar without the help of oxygen!) there will be a champagne reception and midnight supper on the Grand Tier under the Lobmeyr chandeliers as well as dance music by Meyer Davis and his son, Emery, conducting. They'll include 22 dance arrangements with operatic themes. You'll see a fashion show, hear arias by American-born stars—this is the Bicentennial, after all. If you want to see the Opera Club turned into a Mississippi river boat with a rock group and discothèque, here's your opportunity. Individual subscriptions to the ball, $90; add $35 for orchestra or Grand Tier seats. For opera only, $50 a seat. Then, because the Met still feels the recession, further contributions of $50 or more would be appreciated. White tie preferred. Dennis McCrary is chairman. It's a long evening. Curtain rises at 8 P.M.; party ends at 3:30 A.M.

Behold Bunthorne Raffle Himself Off

March 30-April 3—"Patience, an Aesthetic Opera," the 6th of the 14 Gilbert and Sullivan operettas, will be the 52d annual production of The Blue Hill Troupe Ltd. at the Hunter College Playhouse. The rapturous maidens, the dairymaid heroine, Bunthorne, the fleshly poet (plus his solicitor): Grosvenor (not a square, but an idyllic poet), and officers of the Dragoon Guards will all sing and cavort for the benefit of Fountain House, a psychiatric rehabilitation center that assists community adjustment of men and women who have been hospitalized for mental illness. Tickets, $5 to $25, from Mrs. Robert S. Erskine Jr., 530 East 86th Street.

The Flower of Alumni, Sweet Williams All

March 31—A group of Williams College alumni who own works by the likes of Rodin, Matisse, Picasso, Calder, Pollock and Andrew Wyeth will lend 100 contributions from their collections for an exhibition at the Hirschl & Adler Gallery, 21 East 76th Street, April 1 through 24. No admission charge, but catalogue sales will aid Williams College Museum of Art, as will this Wednesday benefit preview from 8:30 to 11 P.M. Preview tickets, which admit two, are $35 from the Wiliams 24 East 39th Street. It just doesn't pay to be single this time.

Hadassah Will Honor Underwriters of Youth

March 31—Two hundred men and women who are each underwriting the care of an Israeli child for one year will be honored at the annual Ima (Mother) Luncheon of the New York chapter of Hadassah in the Imperial Ballroom of the Americana Hotel. Proceeds will be used for Youth Aliyah, Hadassah Israel education services and youth activities in Israel and the United States. Tickets, $25.

Benvenuto Bicentenario!

April 1—The Boys' Town of Italy's 31st "Ball of the Year" in the Waldorf-Astoria Grand Ballroom will forsake its usual spring décor for — you guessed it—red, white and blue. However, there'll be Italian accents like the Venus de Medici (she's the one with arms) replica, which will be on stage as Italy's Bicentennial gift to the United States. Skitch Henderson and his orchestra and Anna Maria Alberghetti will be there, too. Austin D'Alton is general chairman and Marco Buitoni the dinner chairman. Tickets, $100.

Halls, Shores, Awards

April 2—The 14th annual Leatherneck Ball in the New York Hilton Grand Ballroom, which is big enough to hold one of Horatio Hornblower's ships complete with crew and company of marines, will benefit the National Marine Corps scholarship fund. John T. Connor, chairman of the board and chief executive officer of the Allied Chemical Corporation; Frank Gifford, ABC sportscaster and former New York football Giant, and television's Ed McMahon, a former marine, will receive the Col. I. Robert Kriendler, Gil Hodges and Globe and Anchor Awards. Dancing to Emery Davis. Tickets, $100. from the foundation office, 20 Nassau Street, Princeton, N.J.

Women's Rites of Spring

April 3—The National Tay-Sachs and Allied Diseases Association will hold its 19th annual luncheon and fashion show in the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel Plaza. More than 500 volunteers who work the year through gathering funds will have a spring lunch and examine fashions and co-ordinate accessories from The Exceptional Woman boutique on Madison Avenue. Gene Klavan of WNEW-AM will be the guest speaker. Tickets, $25.

Italian Migration Party

April 3—The Brooklyn women's division of the American Committee on Italian Migration will hold its annual luncheon and fashion show in the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. Tickets are $17.50.

Watergate Revisited

April 5—"All the President's Men," the film version of the book that read like a whodunit by Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward, Washington Post reporters, will star Robert Redford and Dustin Hoffman. It will have a benefit premiere at Loews Astor Plaza Theater, which plus a post-theater buffet supper at the U. S. Steakhouse Company in the Time-Life Building will aid two organizations, the Natural Resources Defense Council and the Scientists Institute for Public Information. If that sounds serious, and it is, you can lighten things up by searching for the two reporters and the stars who play them. They'll all be there. Premiere tickets, $25. Premiere plus party tickets, $100, from Arts, Letters, Politics, 250 West 57th Street.

Listen As You Look

April 6—"Listening to the Bamboo" may sound like the beginning of a haiku, one of those Japanese poems that suggest the whole of a monumental subject in the fewest, shortest lines possible, but it isn't. It's the descriptive half of Asia House Gallery's spring exhibition: the explicit half after the colon is "the art of Wen Cheng-ming." The artist was a 16th-century Chinese scholar and painter, considered one of the Ming dynasty's four masters. The benefit preview will have Mrs. Ronald Tree and C. Richard MacGarth as chairmen, dancing and "cabaret musical magic" by Terry Hammond, who likes those 1930's songs. Tickets, $75.

San Francisco Police Chief Under Fire

By WALLACE TURNER
Special to The New York Times

SAN FRANCISCO, March 27—The question is this: Can an experienced, confident former police chief in Oakland successfully ride the tiger that is the San Francisco Police Department?

Charles Gain, 52 years old, took command of the 1,800-member San Francisco force on Jan. 12. Not quite three months later it is plain to all who care here that he is the target of an attempt to drive him out.

Things reached the point this week that when the new Mayor, George R. Moscone, made his first speech as Mayor to the Commonwealth Club, a prestigious forum, one of the first questions asked was: "How long do you expect Charles Gain will last as police chief?"

"If the people will wise up and show that they are more concerned about the well-being of your purse, your pocketbook and your cranium than you are about the interior decorations of the chief's office, he will remain for a long, long time," Mayor Moscone replied.

The audience applauded, which gives a view of the opposition here to the Police Department that has existed since the police strike last August.

Mr. Gain, who was chief in Oakland for four years until retiring in 1973, was the first "outsider" to head the San Francisco department for about a half century. Although he was appointed by the Police Commission, he was picked by Mayor Moscone, 46, a former Democratic State Senator.

Chief Gain's internal problems broke into the public's view two weeks ago when news reports said that police officers were disturbed because Mr. Gain had taken the collection of flags and police department mementos out of his office.

Suddenly police motorcycles sprouted flags on their aerials, and some officers took to wearing small flags on their lapels. The flag at headquarters flew upside down briefly one day. And there were numerous anonymous comments to reporters about how morale had been shattered in the Police Department.

Mr. Gain's experience in Oakland, where he was in the department for 27 years, was dug out. The officers there, it was shown, once held a confidence vote on him as chief. He lost by 375 to 110 among white officers. But black officers unanimously gave him 48 votes of confidence. A part of the problem was his insistence that racist views had no role in police work.

The Police Officers Association here, which called last summer's strike, has no plans to be drawn into the campaign against Mr. Gain, it appeared from statements this week of its officers. The opposition seems to be among the upper echelons of the department.

The day after the "flag flap," as the chief calls it, broke into the papers, he issued, as he says he had planned to do, the new regulations on drinking.

Drinking is an issue in San Francisco, and the police have long been known for doing their share. Instances break into the papers of policemen off duty getting into shooting scrapes, even killing people in quarrels. Many times alcohol is reported as the root cause.

In an interview this week, Chief Gain refused to say how many "problem drinkers" wear San Francisco police badges. He said the problem was substantial.

His regulations restate long-standing rules that forbid drinking while on duty, but they also seem to warn that outside persons may be hired to check on suspected rules violators.

Morale Called an Issue

Police sources have been pushing articles in the papers that "police morale is shattered" by this demonstration of distrust, but Mr. Gain said:

"This Police Department forever has had intense morale problems that come because it has been severely politicized with the mayors over the years wielding great influence on who held all the top positions.

"There were cliques," Mr. Gain also said. "The nine district stations ran on an autonomous basis. A lot of people held their jobs not on merit, but through influence, what here they call 'juice.' "Chief Gain, who opposed police strikes, said he understood—but did not condone the reasons for the strike last August. He said the police had felt they were being done out of what they were entitled to as pay increases under a time-honored formula, and had had no place to turn for the justice they had felt was denied to them.

"The voters rebelled against the police," he said. "You cannot have high morale in those conditions."

So he is making changes. One problem is that 55 per cent of the policemen live outside the city. He said "they come in here, and leave town to go home when the shift is over."

"We have many good people in this department," he said. "I am confident that we can serve the public properly."

"The Park Service has amassed a great deal of useful data, inventoried natural resources and catalogued programs, but has not formulated them into an overall design that reflects the public's longstanding concept of Gateway's potential as one of the great ocean and bay beach parks in the world located in the heart of a densely populated region."

Alternatives Listed

The first proposal of the Park Service, labeled "Alternative A," was designed, in part, to provide intensive use of the areas beaches adn parks for "mass recreation." Three relatively autonomous parks would be developed, at Sandy Hook, on Stateen Island and in the Jamaica Bay-Breezy Point area of Queens.

"Alternative B" would preserve fragile hemnant of the regions' valuable coastline while eliminating "high-density recreation."

"Alternative C" would provide for "green space,' too, but would permit local communities and some agencies to share the administraiton of separate park areas.

The citizen's committee termed the division of the Gateway programs "into so-called alternatives," "illusory and divisive." Its members who estimated taht the Gateway project would be used by 20 million people, also reported:

"There are two major weaknesses in the current transportation studies: There is an emphasis on analyzing the current user pattern, which tells nothing abou the future.

"There is hesitation to move on the franchise changes and additional routes to the heavily used Riis Park and Staten Island beaches and to Sandy Hook, where increased public transportation and limiting auto use require priority."

The committee also said internal park transportation would be necessary and, "If practical and financially feasible, ferry service for passengers linking the park with other attractions in the harbor (South Street Seaport, Statue of Liberty, Castle Clinton) has our enthusiastic support."

The committee urges severe restrictions on these autos within the Gateway.

Railway Services In Delmarva Area To Be Maintained

PHILADELPHIA, Mar 27 (AP)—The Consolidated Rail Corporation, known as Conrail has reached agreements to continue essential rail services on the Delmarva Penninsula, including the car float across Chesapeake Bay and rail operations in Norkfolk, Va.

These lines were for the most part offered for sale to the Southern Railway in the final systems paln of the United States Railway Association. Southern was unable to purchase the lines because it failed to reach agreements with seven of the 20 labor unions representing workers on Penn Central's Delmarva lines.

When the purchase fell through, the Delmarva lines qualified for funds under the Federal Rail Service Continuation Subsidy Program. That program is outlined in the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973. Because of the funds, Conrail was able to work out agreements with the states of Virginia, Maryland and Delaware to maintain service.

A Conrail official said an agreement was signed yesterday with Virginia, and agreements in principle, which are expected to be completedbefore April 1, have been reached with Maryland and Delaware.

All are for one year and are similar to those being negotiated with the 10 other Northeastern and Middle-Western states that are eligible to participate in the program and are served by Conrail.

Effective April 1, Conrail is to take over operation of more than 17,000 miles of rail routes from seven financially ailing railroads in the Northeast and Middle West.

Alaska Receives $300,000 For Plea-Bargaining Study

ANCHORAGE, Alaska, March 22 (AP) — Alaska's efforts to do away with plea bargaining in criminal cases will be studied under a $300,000 Federal grant to see if the plan is worth trying elsewhere.

A spokesman for Representative Don Young, Republican of Alaska, said the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration grant would finance a two-year study by the Alaska Judicial Council of how the elimination of plea bargaining had affected *the handling of felony and mis*demeanor cases.

Michael Rubinstein, executive director of the Judicial Council, said that the "first purpose of the study" would be to determine if plea bargaining really had been abolished in Alaska, or had surfaced "under the table" in another form.

Plea bargaining in all criminal cases was halted in mid-1975 by order of Attorney General Avrum Gross, though it is allowed with the explicit approval of his office in some cases.

The Major Events of the Day—Section 1

International

Moslem and leftist forces in Lebanon were on the move yesterday on the steep, rocky slopes of the mountains east of Beirut. Though slow-moving, this was a crucial battle that might be more important than the fighting in Beirut because it was providing the leverage that Kamal Jumblat, the Moslem leftist leader, was using Damascus as he sought to obtain the resignation of President Suleiman Franjieh. Mr. Jumblat was also seeking much more far-reaching constitutional reforms than the Christian conservatives have been willing to concede. [Page 1, Column 3.]

The Egyptian Government has begun an almost frantic search for equipment to maintain its Soviet-made arms for new sophisticated weapons to replace Russian equipment. President Anwar el-Sadat will visit West Germany, France, Italy and Yugoslavia to discuss arms purchases, and Egyptian officials have begun talks in London on the possible purchase of Chieftain tanks and new engines for the Soviet T-62 tanks now in the Egyptian forces. Egyptian sources in Washington said that the new arms were needed to maintain a military balance in the Middle East. They believe that Israeli military procurement in the United States has shifted the balance in Israel's favor despite the continuing delivery of Soviet arms to Syria. [1:4-6.]

"My husband is so happy over the coup that he's going to pay taxes for the first time," said the wife of an agricultural-machinery contractor at a dinner party in Buenos Aires on the first weekend after Argentina's military coup. The collapse of the Peronist government gave a special glow to one of the sumptuous parties that make upper-class Argentines the social lions of Latin America. [1:4-6.]

The campaign against so-called rightists in China appears to have become more moderate, with less stridently worded attacks and suggestions in the Chinese press that the controversy be turned into what would be a relatively innocuous study movement. A major article in the official daily, Jenmin Jih Pao, titled "We Must Put Study in the First Place," suggested that the people might need "one or two years" of study to understand the issues in the current political conflict. [1:6-7.]

National

Quite often these days at the White House when a button is pushed—be it a policy button, a political button or a bureaucratic button—there is no response. It is clear that President Ford after more than 18 months in office, is conducting the least potent Presidency since the Eisenhower Administration. But Mr. Ford does not believe that he has lost any of what he calls "his basic powers," but there has been, he says, a swing of the "historic pendulum" toward Congress, raising the possibility of a "disruptive" erosion of his ability to govern. [1:1-2.]

Organized labor is fighting a stubborn and sometimes camouflaged battle to retain a major political weapon: The right to spend unlimited, unreported amounts of union money in support of favored candidates. In the current debate in Congress over revising the campaign law, Republicans are trying to compel unions to report this kind of spending, how much and for whom, just as all other political spending is reported under the current disclosure law. Labor is resisting fiercely. [1:1-2.]

Washington residents lined up by the thousands to take a free ride on the inaugural stretch of the city's new subway system. QUOTATION OF THE DAY: "The Metro will bind us all in the metropolitan area closer, bring us all together at our jobs and in understanding each other's cultures, to a point at which we know and understand each other better." — Mayor Walter E. Washington of the District of Columbia, at the opening of the new subway. [46:4.]

The crowds overloaded the cars and caused some delays, some for 45 minutes. Lines of curious people outside station kiosks extended for two to three blocks. On some of the crowded trains, there was spontaneous applause for the fast, smooth 4.6-mile ride from Rhode Island Avenue and Eighth Street to Connecticut Avenue and L Street N.W. Th bus trip between the two points takes 28 minutes. Some of the subway trains made it in seven minutes. The fare on the Washington Metro, as it is called, will be 55 cents in rush hours and 40 cents in non-rush periods. Longer stretches of the line will be added in stages, beginning next year. By the early 1980's there will be an 86-station network extending into Maryland and Virginia. [1:7.]

A scientist who was a leader in growing living human cells in the laboratory has been accused in a Government investigator's report of selling valuable cell specimens that were Government property. The investigator recommended that the National Institutes of Health take action to recover more than $67,000 from Dr. Leonard Hayflick who, in the meantime, has filed suit charging the N. I. H. with defamation. [1:1-2.]

Metropolitan

Mayor Beame met with the three mediators in the stalemated transit negotiations and later described the situation as "grave and very disturbing." He said there was no money in the city treasury to help finance any pay raises in a new contract between the Transport Workers Union and the Transit Authority. Mr. Beame, at a news conference on the steps of Fracie Mansion, was asked whether in view of the city's fiscal plight the situation called for special cooperation by the unions. He replied, "It calls for responsibility, but there has been no indication of any here yet." He also said it would be "unthinkable" for the Transit Authority to raise the 50-cent fare. [1:8.]

With the end of the state's fiscal year only three days away, Governor Carey and the Legislature remain at odds on some key bills affecting both the budget and the state construction agencies that Mr. Carey's office wants enacted before the end of the fiscal year. Several additional items on the Legislature's agenda last week were reportedly being resolved in discussions among staff members over the weekend. The goal is to complete action on a full range of fiscal measures so that the state can proceed with its campaign to raise money from out-of-state banks and corporations to meet its critical borrowing needs this spring. [35:1-4.]

A strong effort to override Mayor Beame's veto of a City Council bill that would outlaw drinking of alcoholic beverages on city streets was promised by Council members who had voted for the bill and by community groups that had supported it. One of the reasons for the Mayor's veto, his first since taking office, was that the drinking ban would be largely unenforceable by a manpower-short police force. Councilman Theodore Silverman, a Brooklyn Democrat, said he believed that there would be enough votes to override the veto. [56:1-3.]

ASTRONAUT'S PACK IS AIDING RESEARCH

Armstrong Is Using a Part to Build a Heart Pump

By JOHN NOBLE WILFORD

Although the backpack that Neil A. Armstrong wore on the first walk on the moon lies forlorn among the historic debris at Tranquility Base, a duplicate of one component of that pack has emerged as a surprising but important element in Mr. Armstrong's newest adventure.

The former astronaut, a professor of aerospace engineering at the University of Cincinnati, is now quietly exploring ways to solve some of the problems of bioengineering—one of which is the need for better blood pumps for use in heart-lung machines and in artificial hearts and kidneys.

This reminded Mr. Armstrong of his moon pack and the small, efficient pump inside it that circulated cooling water throughout a network of plastic tubing in his space suit. It was called the Apollo double-diaphragm pump.

Mr. Armstrong and three other scientists borrowed one of the pumps from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, conducted experiments with animals and reported preliminary but encouraging results at a recent meeting of the Association for the Advancement of Medical Instrumentation in Boston. The Apollo pump, they found, was 10 or more times less damaging to red blood cells than previous pumps.

Modifications Needed

In a telephone interview, Mr. Armstrong cautioned that the pump must be modified and then further tested before it could be considered for use in machines for pumping human blood. He said that discussions were under way with a manufacturer to support development of an operational pump system.

The other scientists working with Mr. Armstrong are Dr. Henry J. Heimlich, a surgeon at Jewish Hospital in Cincinnati and associate clinical professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine; Dr. George Rieveschl, a medical scientist and vice-president for special projects at the university, and Dr. Edward A. Patrick, an engineering professor at Purdue University.

The team is known informally by the acronym HARP, after the first letters in each scientist's last name. Much of their research is conducted through the university's recently established Institute of Engineering and Medicine.

Discussing the work, Mr. Armstrong said that one of his faculty associates, a surgeon, had spoken to him months ago about the problem of blood pumps.

A Delicate Substance

Blood is such a delicate substance that it is easily damaged by prolonged mechanical pumping. Turbulence and foreign surfaces tend to break the fragile membrane of the red cell inside of which is the oxygen-carrying hemoglobin. As the blood is re-circulated by the mechanical pump, more and more of the red cells are thus destroyed, and this can lead in time to life-threatening complications.

The success of open-heart surgery was made possible by the development of pumps that could safely take over the heart's blood-pumping function for several hours. But surgeons would like to have devices that are safer over longer periods of time.

"The Apollo pump occurred to me because of its efficiency from the power and weight standpoint," Mr. Armstrong said. "But I was afraid hemolysis [destruction of red cells] would be too high."

The pump consists of two chambers, each with its own inlet and outlet valves. Between the chambers is a rocking arm connected to a diaphragm in each chamber. As the arm rocks back and forth, powered by an electronic motor, it simultaneously pressurizes one chamber and depressurizes the other, emptying the former and filling the latter.

No Moving Parts

Because the pump was designed to run on a minimum of power, it created little turbulence in the fluid flow. Because it had to be very reliable, there were no moving parts for the fluid to come in contact with.

These features contributed to the pump's success in the blood experiments, Mr. Armstrong said. His team ran canine blood, treated with anticoagulant compounds, through the pump and then measured damage to red cells.

Even without special linings to reduce blood damage, the team reported in a scientific paper, the Apollo pump was gentler to blood than others now in use.

Mr. Armstrong said that the university's institute is experimenting with new techniques and equipment involving respiratory and blood oxygenation procedures.

"We've had good success with some new surgical techniques, but only in animals," he said. "We've got a ways to go."

As for the life of a university professor, nearly seven years after his moon landing in 1969, Mr. Armstrong remarked:

"I enjoy the teaching and research, and the freedom."

Albee coaches Dewhurst and Gazzara in his "Virginia Woolf."

Albee: 'I Want My Intent Clear'

By DANIEL STERN

"I've been sneaking up on this second career, this directorial thing, over the years," said Edward Albee. "I started directing with 'The Zoo Story,' 'American Dream' and 'The Sand Box,' in revivals, as early as 1963. I've even directed a couple of other people's plays—I did Howard Moss's 'The Palace at 4 A.M.' in East Hampton—and of course I did 'Seascape' on Broadway last season."

Albee, at 48, is directing the Broadway revival of his most famous play, "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" The production, starring Colleen Dewhurst and Ben Gazzara, opens Thursday at the Music Box. If the challenge of directing his own greatest success has made him at all tense, it was not evident during a recent discussion of the play and its extraordinary history.

Daniel Stern is a novelist and professor of English at Wesleyan University.

It was 14 years ago that "Virginia Woolf" opened on Broadway, starring Uta Hagen and Arthur Hill and directed by Alan Schneider. The result was instant fame for the 34-year-old Albee, who had "started writing plays as a kind of present to myself on my 30th birthday." His first plays, among them "The Zoo Story" and "The American Dream," were staged Off Broadway and were all dense, difficult works of great intensity. But there was nothing to prepare critics or public for the impact of "Virginia Woolf."

The play was a Walpurgis Night of marital ferocity in which George, a history professor, and Martha, his wife, using some of the most uninhibited language the American theater had known until that evening, tore each other to bits. In the process, they destroyed their illusions —one of which was a mys-

Forman studies Nicholson in "Cuckoo's Nest."

Forman: 'Casting Is Everything'

By TOM BURKE

Maybe his name is not yet being mispronounced over cocktails quite as often as Lina Wertmuller's, but undeniably Milos Forman has become, as critic Andrew Sarris puts it (speaking for the majority), "important, very, a brilliant satirist who finds irony in unfunny situations more precisely than anybody now directing." Of course Forman was doing that long before anybody was dropping his name, since his early films, made in his native Czechoslovakia in the early 60's, films like "Loves of a Blonde" and "The Firemen's Ball," which acquired critical praise but no profits, and his first American movie, "Taking Off," a wry tribute to flower children, which acquired neither.

Tom Burke is the author of "Burke's Steerage," a collection of essays and interviews with personalities in the arts.

Finally, at 43, with "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," he has managed to make a movie that has acquired the critics' approval, a mass audience, money, and very possibly—we'll know tomorrow night—a couple of Oscars, including one for him as Best Director. "So far, the money part interests me the least; of course, you won't believe that, but I think money only interests when you have it, and I never have."

There's believability in this friendly man who is clearly European, though attired in standard hip-American mufti, a very unacted believability. But then that's also true of the "Cuckoo's Nest" mental patients. Forman made it impossible to guess who's an actor and who's a bona fide resident of the asylum: more important, he handled the story

, that's not an idle 32, John Denver as famous as the which he borrowed his stage name. Over the past few years, he has had more hit records than anyone but Elton John. His appeal is much broader than the English rocker's, however. In the 1975 Billboard year-end listings, Denver came in No. 1 on four different charts—top singles artist, over-all pop artist, easy listening artist and country album. Add to this his concert tours, his television appearances and his ABC-TV special tomorrow night, which will be the lead-in to the Academy Awards and will feature Frank Sinatra as the guest star, and the conclusion is unmistakable: to white America, this cute blond fellow with the wire rims and the 12-string guitar is not just the ultra all-American boy, he is the personification of pop music.

A Monumental Muddle of American Sculpture

Few exhibitions on the crowded Bicentennial calendar have been as eagerly or as apprehensively awaited as the show of "200 Years of American Sculpture" that has now come to the Whitney Museum of American Art. Here was a subject badly in need of clarification and redefinition, and here was the obvious occasion for taking a fresh look at it. Sculpture has come to occupy a larger and larger place in American art, yet no coherent and up-to-date history of American sculpture exists. A number of recent developments, moreover—the revaluation of both folk art and academic art, the rediscovery of significant figures as different as Augustus Saint-Gaudens, Elie Nadelman and John Storrs, and most important, perhaps, the radical revision of the idea of sculpture that has been proffered in so much of the art claiming to be sculpture in the last decade or more—has made the need of a new historical perspective more urgent than ever.

This is a field, however, that has rarely, if ever, enjoyed the attention of a first-rate mind willing to undertake a scrupulous and synoptic view of it. To bring critical and

"MEDAL OF HONOR RAG"—Dwight Johnson was a black infantryman who was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for killing a number of enemy soldiers in Vietnam while unsuccessfully attempting to rescue a group of his buddies in a burning tank. Back home, his life turned sour and in May, 1971, he walked into a Michigan grocery store, drew a revolver and was promptly shot dead. His story, reported in The Times by Jon Nordheimer, has now inspired a play by Tom Cole. It opens tonight at Theater De Lys after a run in Washington, D.C., where reviewer Richard L. Coe called the play "extraordinary in concept and performance . . . tense, terse, unremitting."

eawakening provided, I'm afraid, the principal e evening. Mr. Richardson might have asked nother question: "What are the actors doing acting, and they aren't. Certainly they are n. Vanessa Redgrave, of whose theater work have heard so much (and so much that was re making her American debut, tall, supple, robe, her bare feet and her sea-drenched mes from her daily plunge into the less than aters of a sheltered fjord. Pat Hingle awaits ffled, half-estranged husband, furrowing his elemental powers that draw his wife, with tide, farther from him. John Heffernan is former suitor ready to turn his attention to the household (though I am puzzled by his look 57 when he announces himself 37); and own chicks of a former marriage, Kimberly n Argo, are particularly fetching. (Miss Farr ung and glistening Celeste Holm, and Miss watched most carefully in the future or we'll e moment she turns into Circe.) Only Richard "Stranger" who walks through oyster-tinted Miss Redgrave for his own and the sea's, is uate: he hasn't the weight or the presence the overpowering lure of what may be the lling a woman back to make her whole, or ll be insanity and/or death.

ost of the players are, they seem terrified of resonance or variety or defined color. It's as n gesture, any marked vocal accent, any ion or acceleration of rate would do fatal 's mysterious, but not all that mysterious, aps expose its pretensions and so blow it to a fluffy-haired old washout, deuce-of-all-ps popping in and out (in the person of makes you wonder what the late Charles ing in this play) to repeat a line from an mmer will be gone and every way to the h ice." But that's meant as prophecy, a t's to come. The ice shouldn't have taken rve is all we have to warm us for at least (played as two, with a single intermission, roduction). Though Miss Redgrave, as that ho once loved a seaman who may or may d and may yet return to spirit her away great pains to describe to her anxious ultaneous attraction and repulsion this has for her, we are permitted to see neither or her fear. The actress's emotional d level; the tug-and-pull isn't graphic, we ather than compelled to feel.

er man from the sea makes his ambiguous Redgrave isn't permitted to dramatize for ning flight into a specter's arms, the abrupt oil. The sound track does it for her, erclaps dictating the patterns of her movement, as harp-scunds from the sea along let us know when she is surrendering l. It is suddenly astonishing to see her, for g rather violently in a chair on the shore, p stop when a certain word is spoken. spurt of energy come from, and where has ng?

ve is not alone in her tempered isolation. played in such measured, muted cadences painfully aware how often the friends and household are not so much acting out s merely talking about talking with one soon. Midway through a longish passage Professor Heffernan and the rapidly arr, Mr. Heffernan murmurs, "Perhaps this is something we should talk about." We are left to speculate, during the balance of the scene, on just what he thought he'd been doing until then. Michael Meyer's translation seems satisfactory enough, but when the more animated lines are uninflected we are apt to hear the clichéd clink of "Why do you bother to tell me all this?" more clearly.

Naturally, one must speculate on the why of the production's somnolence, and there is plenty of time for that. As I brooded, one oddity of the play struck me (it's infrequently performed, and I hadn't read it in some years). None of its mystification is strictly necessary. All of the long dalliance with the symbolically occult, with talk of mermaids and of drowned men rising, with invocations of the tides and the sea's "storm and calm, dark . . . and glittering sunshine, whales and dolphins" is irrelevant to Ibsen's actual thesis. That thesis, when we face it in Act Five, is entirely domestic, a matter of establishing realistic premises for a sound relationship between husband and wife. It goes this way:

Until late in Act Five, Ellida Wangel's husband has been ordering her to banish her seaman-lover from her mind, certainly not to surrender to him when and if he comes. When at last he does come and the crisis is at hand, there is a turnabout. The husband, albeit reluctantly, offers Ellida her freedom to choose: she may do as she wishes, assume responsibility for her own act. The moment such freedom is offered, Ellida uses it, uses it to reject the nightmarish dream and return fully to her husband. The Stranger has no power over her any longer because she is in possession of her own will.

But this very situation has been employed, on the same terms and to the same end, in utterly non-mystical domestic fashion 15 minutes earlier in the play. Miss Farr, as the elder daughter, has been yearning for escape from the lonely seaside dwelling, yearning for the freedom to educate herself. The aging, musty, fumbling Mr. Heffernan has told her he is prepared to see that her dreams come true, and she is overjoyed. She supposes he is offering her money, he has intended a proposal of marriage. Discovering that he comes with the bargain, she is crushed—and of course refuses him. Once he has recovered from his humiliation, he alters the terms: he will guarantee the education with no strings attached, all options are hers alone. Given the choice, she takes him as well. Not ecstatically, to be sure; but freely, because she is free. (The scene sounds as though it ought to play touchingly, doesn't it? It's symptomatic of this production that it moves us not at all.)

But if what Ibsen ultimately means to say—and says twice—can be managed without a mooning after ghosts and a prolonged flirtation with the unfathomable, then the "marriage-to-the-sea" motif becomes so much hocus-pocus, an imposing but unnecessary overlay. The play's content could have been thrashed out in an Ibsen living-room, without driftwood bowers to serve as mermaids' thrones and sea-sand washing about our feet. In which case a director doing the play does indeed have a problem. He must get through the mystical window-dressing (most of the evening) without permitting us to discover that it is essentially gratuitous. Mr. Richardson would seem to have tried solving the problem by suppressing it, by reducing its passions to bare whispers, its impulses to inhibitions. Unfortunately, that only leaves us stranded between the doldrums and the deep blue sea.

An Inadequate 'Zalmen'

There's a scene in Elie Wiesel's "Zalmen or the Madness of God" that apparently won't work no matter how you stage it, and since the scene goes straight to the heart of the play its brief failure is fatal. A company of foreign actors touring Russia asks permission to attend Yom Kippur services in a village synagogue. The Jewish community is so small and so isolated that it can scarcely believe its ears: "I had begun to think that in this godforsaken town we were the last Jews on earth," a member of the council murmurs. Zalmen, the local rabbi's hoptoad of a sexton, takes on prophetic stature whenever the two men are alone: he urges the aged, philosophically resigned rabbi to shake off his torpor and speak out to the strangers during his sermon, thereby relighting the flame of Jewish unity throughout the world. The act is rash to the point of madness because a commissar and guards will be on hand; they will be heard from later.

When Alan Schneider first staged the play at the Arena Theater in Washington, he brought the huddled, herded actors into brief, aborted view. They were whisked away by the authorities instantly, and we realized at once that even if they'd remained they'd have caught no meaningful spark from the vague, if lyrical, exhortation. Now that Mr. Schneider has mounted a new production for a limited engagement at the Lyceum, he has dispensed with that glimpse of the visitors: rabbi Joseph Wiseman, intoning his lines until he becomes a mere gesticulating rhythm, addresses all of us generally, as though the alien performers might be among us. There is, alas, even less sense of contact, either potential or actual.

Which means to me that author Wiesel has chosen an inadequate dramatic/symbolic device to precipitate his crisis. We can't believe that anything could possibly have come of so trivial a confrontation with what are essentially nonentities, and, thus robbed of our sense of significant event, we are left only with prolonged preparation and prolonged aftermath. Paul Sparer and David Margulies fare best among the debaters, Mr. Sparer as pragmatic liaison-man between the Russians and his fellow Jews, Mr. Margulies as a non-believer whose conscience is slowly aroused. But Mr. Schneider's staging, once fluid and evocative on an open playing-space, becomes two-dimensional as a crossword puzzle now that it is locked inside a proscenium, and Mr. Wiesel's dialectics seem far more sententious than before ("You don't listen, you are deaf," "Perhaps you are blind," "It is you who are blind!").

The commissar, once he has completed his investigation of the forbidden outburst, asks rabbi Wiseman how he could possibly have been so naïve. "Did you really think your ideas could shake the world?" he asks with a pitying smile. And that's the real trouble. Whatever the rabbi may have thought, we didn't believe it could happen. Unless there's an outside chance, there just isn't any play.

THEODORE MANN

The Circle Roundly Disagrees

In "A Theater at Middle Age, or, Squaring the Circle," (March 7) critic Julius Novick observed that the Circle in the Square on its 25th anniversary "has stopped making history. Nowadays, it offers stars in safe classics to subscription audiences: worthy work, tremendously exciting sometimes, but not like the old days." Theodore Mann, artistic director of Circle in the Square, responds.

By and large, Julius Novick's article was perceptive of the history of Circle in the Square. However, Mr. Novick exhibited a lack of understanding of what the Circle is —and what it isn't. The Circle in the Square is an instrument (a public stage) for the continuity of art. It is and always has been an actors' theater. Our greatest gratitude goes to those artists who have made the classics come blazingly alive, made them new plays with interpretations in harmony with, or far beyond, the authors' original concepts. Twenty-five years after "Death of a Salesman" was originally produced, Arthur Miller said that Martin Sheen's last scene speech as Happy [in the Circle's revival] was the first time he had heard it as he had conceived it. That is what the Circle is—the actor/artist challenging the tradition of the classics and bringing to them his intuitive, highly personal vision of the role.

The Circle is not a duplicator. We are interpreters who hold the classics up to our sunshine in the hope of making them glow.

"Nowadays the Circle offers safe classics," Mr. Novick writes, and we are, he comments, middle-aged, but the classics are neither old, middle-aged, young, nor safe. They exist for their own sake, if they speak to our times. I am proud to say the classics are alive and well at the Circle, and as anyone responsible for putting on the classics knows deep down in the marrow of his bones, there is no safe play. How many "safe" classics does one encounter on Broadway? In the last four years, since we opened our new theater on Broadway, we have presented 12 classics—more than the combined total of all Broadway productions of the classics. Were it not for the Circle in the Square and other institutional theaters, the public would be deprived of the opportunity to experience the greatest stage works extant.

As for Mr. Novick's comment, "It is sad to see the Circle, which used to make its own stars, wooing them from Hollywood and elsewhere," he looks at a Picasso and refuses to acknowledge it a masterpiece. George C. Scott, Vanessa Redgrave, Jim Dale, Maureen Stapleton, Rip Torn, Irene Papas, Nicol Williamson, Anne Jackson, Eli Wallach, Cathleen Nesbitt, Julie Christie, Geraldine Fitzgerald, James Earl Jones, Rita Moreno, Siobhan McKenna, Barnard Hughes, Elizabeth Wilson, and Lillian Gish are great actors who work in Hollywood, London, and elsewhere. But they were and are stage actors. If there is a comment about the Circle in this respect it seems to me that it should be the fact that the Circle provides an environment and a creative atmosphere where these artists can carefully and thoughtfully work at their craft. More and more these great artists are returning to their roots, the stage, and we, their fellow artists, are blessed by that decision. Vanessa Redgrave chose to appear on Broadway for the first time at the Circle in the Square because of the unique opportunity to work in one of Ibsen's most demanding and difficult plays, "The Lady From the Sea."

Mr. Novick notes that in our early days we didn't use stars. And he is partially correct. Twenty-five years ago you could hardly get an Equity actor to appear in what were then godforsaken theaters. Certainly, the critics were rarely seen even walking by those murky halls. Does he not think we would have been pleased to have a Paul Muni, a Katharine Hepburn, a Fredric March, an Edward G. Robinson, a Helen Hayes, or a Laurence Olivier join us in those days?

It is true, as Mr. Novick states, that fine actors were "discovered" in the productions of our early years, but even he begrudgingly recognizes the ascending brilliance of

He smiles at this long, qualified rumination and adds, "You won't necessarily end up with the most effective production. But you'll have what you originally intended. And at this point in my life I'm much more interested in making my intentions clear."

What had been unclear about the first "Virginia Woolf"?

"Well, when the play first opened, I was confused by certain reactions among critics and audiences. People seemed to think that George and Martha actually believed there was a real child. Naturally, they found it hard to accept the notion that two such rational and articulate people believed they had a kid when they didn't. What I'm trying to get clear now is: the death of the child is the death of a metaphor—a metaphor with which these two have been sustaining, and torturing, themselves."

How did he deal with that, in directing Miss Dewhurst and Mr. Gazzara?

"At first they were playing the death of a real child. And what we were getting was a kind of dirge-like quality . . . mourning. It was heavy and yet not really intense. After I explained the child as a kind of metaphoric game-playing, the dirge-like quality was gone. And they were playing more intensely."

Was Albee at all inhibited by the knowledge that he was following such distinguished directors of "Virginia Woolf" as Alan Schneider, Franco Zeffirelli and Mike Nichols?

"No," he replied. "You see, Schneider and I worked very closely. Zeffirelli essentially copied the New York production. And Nichols only did the film. It was quite good, as filmed versions of plays go, but directing films is another matter entirely. I've been lucky with 'Virginia Woolf.' No director has tried to superimpose his personality to the extent of doing damage to the clear line of the play. Maybe that's because the play has a very clear line. Nobody has tried to put in too many improvements. So, though there have been splendid directors at work over the years, I haven't had a variety of interpretations to work through."

How would he characterize himself as a director?

"Look," Albee said, "three-quarters of the trick of directing is to start with a good play and good actors. If you've got a good play, then the job is to plot out your work very carefully, but still leave room for improvising, for a certain amount of on-the-spot intuitive directing. No matter how organized you are it's good to be flexible enough to be able to surprise yourself with new solutions."

> 'I reread the play to see if it can function on the homosexual level and it can't. That's a bunch of nonsense.'

What happens when actors resist directorial suggestions?

"Really good actors don't resist reasonable direction. If a good actor does resist—then, if you're smart, you think twice about your suggestion. Finally, if you want to know about a director, you'd better ask the actors."

Over a dietetic dinner and a glass of club soda, Colleen Dewhurst admits to having launched the current production. "The whole thing started when the people at the Kennedy Center asked me to appear in the Bicentennial theater series they were doing. When I found out they were not doing any play by Albee I couldn't believe it. Well, I'd done 'Virginia Woolf' in stock—just two weeks—and I thought, 'This is the time.' I called Edward and he was interested and here we are."

How is it to work with a director who is also the playwright?

"I was nervous at first, because the language is so incredibly lovely, it's like learning to work with poetry or music; it needs real ensemble playing. One of the reasons Edward agreed to direct this production is that there are things he wanted brought out that haven't been brought out before. He helped me track down the character of Martha, helped me make her more human—not just neurotic, and not stupid. When she's struck down by George, at the end, there's a temptation to indulge in self-pity. But Edward helped me to avoid the typical woman's response to a child's death. Played his way, it's unsentimental—and just as moving."

Earlier, Albee had been telling me how he felt about the different interpretations of "Virginia Woolf": "The play is an examination of whether or not we, as a society, have failed the principles of the American Revolution. There's no argument that George and Martha were named after George and Martha Washington. And their non-existent child is our failure to follow those principles, not staying an adventurous and revolutionary society."

How about the oft-voiced notion that George and Martha are really a homosexual couple squabbling about a child they naturally couldn't have?

"That's a bunch of nonsense. I remember one critic saying that the only way he could accept the play was if he didn't have to see it as a heterosexual relationship. I reread the play to see if it can function on the homosexual level and it can't! In fact, I asked Uta Hagen, Elizabeth Taylor and others who had played Martha if they thought they were playing a man. Well, it had never occurred to them. You know I get lots of requests from amateur groups to do this play with four men. I've left very simple instructions: Do the play the way it was written, with two men and two women. I used to be quite annoyed. But now it's kind of funny."

At a rehearsal later that day, I watch as Albee suggests to Miss Dewhurst that she use the mantelpiece of William Ritman's one-room set to better advantage—perhaps get a suggestion of power by putting her elbows up behind her (the mantel turns out to be too high). He discusses with Ben Gazzara the precise reason for his anger at Martha at the beginning of Act One. The anger, Albee suggests, derives from Martha's behavior at the party they have just left.

This is Gazzara's first appearance in an Albee play. I ask him about Albee, the director.

"For a playwright/director he's very practical. He spends a lot of time blocking the play. He said he wants a sense of how people would move if they'd been living in that house for years. And I don't know if it was Albee the playwright or Albee the director who put more love in the play, but he sort of gave us the permission to make it a love story, not a hate story. For me, personally, Edward helped me see the way George enjoys language—the pleasure he takes in putting words together. After all, he is an academic. And this triggers more humor as he spars with his wife. There's a mutual pleasure in their struggle, and language is the chosen weapon. I think all the motivations are strong and clear this time out."

The run-through goes smoothly. Albee takes notes and restlessly crosses from aisle to aisle in the empty theater, looking at the stage from different angles. The dialogue, prompted lines notwithstanding, crackles.

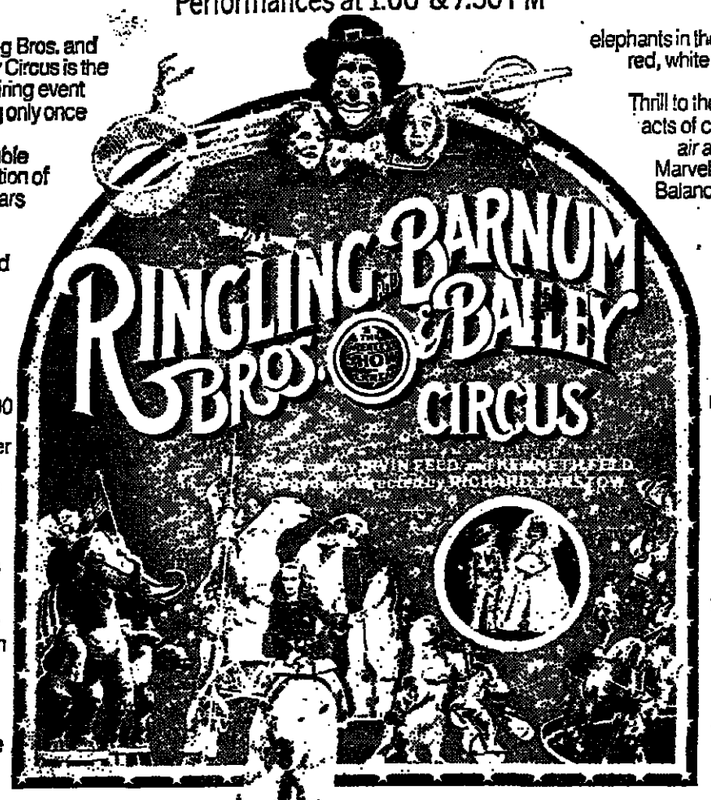
At one point in our discussion, Albee had remarked about the film version of his play, which starred Richard Burton and Elizabeth Taylor. "Curiously enough, the film became a story from the woman's point of view. Burton trying so hard to support Elizabeth, I suppose. But it became a one-sided affair. That's not happening here, with Colleen Dewhurst and Ben Gazzara. They're both strong performers — such tough actors—that it's an equal battle. In this play, balance is everything."

Afterward, as we stand outside the theater for a moment, I remember how much the original experience of this play had reminded me of Beckett. Albee, leather coat slung over his shoulder, is ready to sprint away. I ask him about the influence of Beckett.

"I take sustenance from wherever I can get it. Chekhov, Beckett, Noël Coward. Back in 1962, when I was just getting started, I made a list of 25 living writers that a whole slew of critics in Europe and the United States had compared me to. It included six whose work I didn't know. It's a game after a while—who resembles whom. I'm involved in a life and death struggle with myself." ■

OPENS THIS THURSDAY, APRIL 1.

Performances at 1:00* & 7:30 PM*



The 1976 Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus is the kind of awe-inspiring event that comes along only once in a lifetime.
A mammoth Double Birthday celebration of Two Hundred Years of American Independence and Two Hundred Years of Circus.
Never have so many colossal stars, acts and animals been combined under one roof. Over 300 performers from 23 countries. Over 200 animals.
Attend the circus wedding of the world's smallest man and his lilliputian bride as the "Marriage of Michu" is re-enacted every performance, with the assistance of 52 children from the audience.
You'll sit spellbound as the largest herd of elephants in the world performs a red, white and blue salute to the Spirit of '76.
Thrill to the most hair-raising acts of courage high in the air and on the ground.
Marvel at the Phantom of Balance, as he walks the "death-defying whirling wheel."
Gaze in disbelief as an incredible troupe of daredevils accomplishes a feat never before attempted. One man vaulted to the shoulders of 5 men, forming a human tower over 32-feet high.
Watch one girl alone challenge the supremacy of 10 giant white polar bears in a test of courage not seen since David and Goliath.
This year the Circus is more than The Greatest Show on Earth. It's the event of a lifetime.

Meredith Monk's Tapestry of Music and Dance

Dance

By JOHN ROCKWELL

Meredith Monk, whose new music-dance-theater event, "Quarry," begins Friday at the La Mama Annex, has called her works operas, opera-epics, theater cantatas, live movies, composite theater, non-verbal opera, visual poetry, image dance and mosaic theater. Miss Monk started her professional life as a dancer, however, and most of the time she has been reviewed by dance critics.

Her work has been both extravagantly praised and disparaged. In 1967, for example, Anna Kisselgoff called her "spectacularly original" and Clive Barnes dismissed her as "mildly tedious." Two years later Mr. Barnes denounced her as "a disgrace to the name of dancing," but recently Robb Baker of the SoHo Weekly News rhapsodized that she "is the most significant intermedia artist of our time."

I can remember reading about her "Vessel" four years ago and feeling that I just had to get out of Los Angeles, where I was living, and go to New York, where such amazing things were happening. What got to me more than anything was Deborah Jowitt's description in The Times of "the final hair-raising moment when Monk, identified as Joan of Ark . . . begins an odd skittering little dance that carries her into the depths of a parking lot, where she disappears into the flame and sparks of a [welding] torch."

Miss Monk's most recent evening-long piece, "Education of the Girlchild," is representative of her approach and concerns. The piece—presented first in a downtown space in the summer of 1973, then repeated in an expanded version both downtown and in the shadowy recesses of the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine—was theatrical, but hardly conventional Broadway. There were theatrical tableaux with six women, Miss Monk among them, in various sorts of white costume and a seventh in festive Peruvian peasant attire. In the first part, they went through a series of rites and visions, some verbalized but mostly danced and mimed. At one point there was a medieval morality play, with the figure of death appearing in two different, ornate guises and a grotesque, Boschian dance of death. There was a lurching procession, the kind that sometimes appears on the hour in European city-hall clocks, with each woman bearing on her head some symbolic, totem-like prop—a globe, a miniature house, a lizard, a bunch of roots. At the end of the first part, Miss Monk was costumed as an ancient crone and left to sit alone, immobile throughout the intermission, on a cloth-shrouded throne from which stretched a crumpled white river of cloth. In the second part, she proceeded to execute a 45-minute solo, passing through all the stages of a woman's life in reverse, back to childhood. Finally, she stepped off the cloth and was held, dazed, as her five woman companions, dressed in velvet gowns, revolved slowly in place.

But that description, which may suggest the surrealist dream pictures of Robert Wilson, can't begin to capture the complexity of the piece. In all her work, there is a tangled undergrowth of private imagery—sometimes so much of it that Miss Monk can be justly accused of overloading her audiences with incomprehensible symbolism. In addition, there are her extraordinary settings, costumes and, especially, props. And, of course, powerful dance elements, too. Miss Monk's sense of movement and her choreographing of mass movements remain among the most acute of the dance experimentalists—full of quick stylizations of natural motion, funny, oddly flowing, puppet-like jerkiness and sudden ritual poses. And then there is her music, which so far has included child-like keyboard pieces vaguely reminiscent of Eric Satie and Miss Monk's own yelping, chant-like singing.

After "Girlchild," in 1974 and 1975, came a still-to-be-completed series of smaller works, most co-created with Ping Chong, a multi-media artist and long-time collaborator. But much of Miss Monk's time over the past two years has been spent in preparing "Quarry," which will run at La Mama through April 18. Miss Monk is loath to dwell on the specifics of the new work, but it is clear that in broad terms it represents an extension of her past concerns. This time, in addition to 10 central characters from her performing group, The House, there will be a chorus of 30, who both sing and dance, and three instrumentalists. Miss Monk, who worries about sounding pretentious, explains the title as "a digging up of memory, of racial unconsciousness. I don't want to say it's a prophecy, but I am very interested in archetypes. The one I'm coming to more and more is the oracle or the sibyl. I'm not so pretentious to think I am one. But when I sing I feel the energy taking me over. The voice of the gods or something. It's like a healing, something coming through me."

Phillip E. Hilwell

In "Quarry," which Miss Monk calls "a memorial piece for a world at war—a myth, a documentary and a requiem," her problem has been "how to balance between specificity and abstraction. 'Vessel' and 'Juice' [another large-scale piece, presented at the Guggenheim Museum, a theater and a loft in 1969] were gigantic landscapes. 'Girlchild' grew out of the characters in it. In 'Quarry' I've melded the character thing and the landscape thing together—if it works."

The music for "Quarry" would seem to be Miss Monk's most ambitious yet, to judge from the unison chants and choral polyphony heard at a recent rehearsal. Music was part of her life very early: "I sang before I talked, and read music before I read words—at three." But despite piano lessons throughout her childhood and voice studies at Sarah Lawrence, she had decided to concentrate on dance by the time she graduated in 1964. "I had this union of the voice and the body in mind then but I guess I wasn't physically strong enough." In the course of the works she began presenting in New York after 1964, she "realized that the voice could be as flexible as a foot or a spine, that it could be waves of energy."

From the beginning she experimented with more than just dance. "I was never really interested in pure movement, in pure physicality. My work was always trying to break through the boundaries."

Since 1970 she has given several solo concerts of her keyboard and vocal music; the next is scheduled for Town Hall on May 12. She has also made two records—one on an obscure West Coast label, Increase, and the other on a private label of her own—and is preparing a third.

Miss Monk's chaste and evocative instrumental music is so simple that it seems simple-minded to some. She confesses a fascination not only with Perotin, Satie and Bartók, but with "children's pieces of all the composers. To get it down to that form, you really have to know what you're doing." In 1974 and 1975 she gave a concert in which she sang music by Schütz, Purcell, Ravel, Satie and Bach. To judge from a videotape, if she wanted to Miss Monk could have a respectable career in conventional classical music. But she has already perfected her own technique to emit amazing varieties of sounds rarely heard from a Western throat, full of wordless cries and moans, a lexicon of vocal coloration, glottal attacks and microtonal waverings that lie at the base of all musical cultures.

Miss Monk resists the obvious comparison to Robert Wilson's work—"His background is painting and architecture," she argues. "His work is visually based; mine comes from dance and music." But she does admit a kinship with not only Mr. Wilson but other lower Manhattan experimentalists who are reaching out beyond traditional borders — people such as Charlie Morrow, Charlemagne Palestine, Allen Ginsburg and the other performing poets, and Patti Smith, the rock singer. "I don't think I'm alone," she says. "It's all part of a rejection of the West, a spiritual thing of trying to get back to a whole. You can't be a jack of all trades but master of none, though. You have to work in your own personal way, developing your own iconography. In a way, I've been focusing down over the years. I think of what I'm doing as a tapestry or a weaving—if it's good, the weaving has to hold." ■

The Joffrey Rejoices in th Genius of Joo

The City Center Joffrey Ballet certain no apologias. In its comparatively b it has achieved a great deal: a sp school of dancing, the development Arpino as a major American choreo the special understanding of the rel between classic ballet and modern-dance—that balance. But even if the Joffrey Ballet had ac none of this, it would still be worth its salt, it w still amply justify its existence. Why? Simply th adoption and rehabilitation of a major choreo artist, the 75-year-old Kurt Jooss. Jooss, when him, was almost a ghost from the past. To be his pacifist masterpiece, "The Green Table," repertories all over the world. But the work thre to submerge Jooss with kindness, to play Pa Leoncavallo! Joffrey changed all that.

When Jooss gave up his international tourin about 20 years ago (although in semi-retireme still maintains a school and performing group Germany) his reputation slipped. Apart from th and ubiquitous "Green Table," no one seemed to to revive his other works, which, in a sense, w fitted oddly in most classical repertories. Eight ago "The Green Table" was one of the first ma Joffrey undertook when his company became troupe at the City Center 55th Street Theater last year he revived another Jooss work, the pungent "Big City." It was the success of this this season to prepare a complete Jooss eve honor of the choreographer's 75th birthday.

During his major creative years, which ran about 1932 until the end of the 1950's, Jooss m many ballets. But there was one special progra associated with the company—his archetypa program, generally used on first and last nigh indeed the very program that introduced the B Jooss, the choreographer's own company, to N more than 40 years ago. The program always "The Big City," continued with "Pavane on th of an Infanta," and then the first part would "A Ball in Old Vienna." Various musical exce be presented between the three ballets. After a the second part of the evening would consist Green Table."

Joffrey's decision to present this program of weeks ago was very courageous; a comp of Kurt Jooss is not perhaps to everyone's taste New York of 1976. Naturally, the program is given merely as a unit, and the two new balle and "Old Vienna," have entered the general r Yet, it is as a complete unit that this Jooss pr has its special validity.

It is difficult for us now to comprehend the wild and fervent originality of Kurt Joos 1930's and 40's. He was a pupil of the Germa

FILM VIEW

VINCENT CANBY

Would You Let Your Sister Invest in a Plot Like That?

Ray Stark? Carlo Ponti? Sam Spiegel? Dino de Laurentiis? Roger Corman? Francis Ford Coppola? Harry Saltzman? Joe Levine? Tom Laughlin? Which one do you want to be? The name of the game is Movie Mogul or, Would You Let Your Sister Invest In a Movie Like This and, If You Would, How Much Money Do You Think The Movie Would Make?

All of us—even critics—occasionally walk out of a theater muttering in anger, impatient with the brainlessness of producers who would think that such a movie could be anything except the mess it's turned out to be. However, not all producers are brainless and very few of them set out to make a flop. Just as much soul-searching, care and talent can go into the production of a turkey as into the creation of a film that becomes a critical and financial smash. You never can tell, or, at least, not very often.

To dramatize this point, there are synopsized below the treatments of 10 films that were released in 1974 and 1975. Would these treatments interest you as a producer? Do you feel they would interest enough other people to earn back production investments ranging anywhere between $200,000 and $20,000,000? Put your reputation where your mouth is. Name the film that the treatment eventually became and estimate how much money it earned. The films are arranged in no particular order of hit or flop. The answers are listed below, with the domestic earnings of each film as reported in the Jan. 7, 1976 issue of Variety.

1. A drama about the tribulations of an assortment of people who take a North Cape cruise, during which they see polar bears, reindeers, whales and a lot of eccentric natives who are so backward they haven't yet invented the souvenir shop.

2. Such tensions can develop in any family: Dad, who's worked hard and built up a good business, wants to hand it over to his son as soon as Junior gets married. Junior marries but on his wedding night suspects his wife is something less than the spotless flower she pretends to be. Junior starts fiddling around with the maid. Junior's wife starts fiddling around with the gardener. The house becomes a mess. Meals are served at odd hours; nothing gets dusted properly. With no holds barred, this film exposes the dangers of being rude to the domestic help.

3. The hero—we'll call him Jack, though that's not his name—is a four-star nut when it comes to a particular activity, which we'll say is chess, though that's not his game. Jack is footloose about everything except chess. He's obsessed by chess and by a missed opportunity to match his skills with those of a famous old champ. After lots of exciting scenes of chess playing, Jack realizes his dream and dies.

4. Based on a book that's regarded as a classic, this film has everything—spectacle, romance, comedy, pathos, gore. The hero, a bland young man trying to make his way in a corrupt world, meets all sorts of fascinating people and observes two spectacular battles, the cost of which account for a large part of the film's budget.

5. "Coal and oil resources will soon be depleted," says a solemn character at the beginning of this one, a movie that sets out to make the energy crisis comprehensible to the man in the street, even to those who don't own cars. The serious subject is treated in a comic vein with full appreciation of the short attention spans of TV-oriented movie audiences. Some of the scenes take place in the Far East.

6. A very fancy dinner party goes from bad to worse when the food cannot be served. In this "Grand Hotel" format we meet—and share a few intimate moments with—Doug Roberts, a famous architect in love with Susan Franklin, a famous fashion editor who knows James Duncan, a famous businessman whose famous daughter, Patty, is married to a famous cad named Roger Simmons. It's one of those dinner parties where everyone famous starts to leave at the same time but can't, as in a nightmare. The true glories of this sort of film have little to do with plot.

7. Two cops, one short and square, the other tall and easygoing, feel they are misunderstood by their superiors. They want to catch the Mr. Big of the drug trade but their superiors keep interfering, forcing them to moonlight their investigation and face death on their own time. Almost the entire film is spent getting into cars, riding in cars, parking cars, or getting out of cars. The movie also has some jokes.

8. The young man works in a garage. The young woman is a car-hop at a drive-in hamburger stand. Their shared interest in and dependence upon transportation brings them together, though they only understand the full depth of their love for each other when he accidentally shoots a store owner he was only pretending to rob. Tragedy is thus thrust upon them in a fashion that forces us to acknowledge that the little people of this world have feelings too.

9. Though the young man and young woman are brother and sister, their relationship is portrayed as being absolutely normal, which it is, as is their life, until they are abducted for purposes that need not be revealed. They are eventually saved from the abductors, if not from themselves, by a represeniative of an underprivileged class, who is then rewarded by becoming the third member of what was originally a ménage à deux. This is the kind of movie not even the French would dare to make.

10. The man and his wife are fed up with city living and move to a small town in an attempt to connect with life's good things. Unfortunately they discover that small town life is equally corrupt and even more unsafe, and that evil lurks just out of sight waiting to spring when most unexpected. It's "Main Street" remodeled for the easily bored, sociology spiced up with comedy, suspense and plastic special effects.

Okay, here are the answers: 1. Disney's "Island At The Top Of The World" ($10,000,000); 2. "Mandingo" ($8,600,000); 3. "The Great Waldo Pepper," about barnstorming stunt pilots ($9,400,000); 4. "The Day Of The Locust" ($2,300,000); 5. "The Man With The Golden Gun" ($9,500,000); 6. "Towering Inferno" ($55,000,000); 7. "Freebie and The Bean" ($12,500,000); 8. "Aloha, Bobby and Rose" ($6,000,000); 9. "Benji" ($30,800,000); 10. "Jaws" ($102,650,000).

No holds barred

'Casting Is Everything,' Says 'Cuckoo's' Director, Milos Forman

hospital without cracking themselves. My God, the process of making any movie, even some musical comedy, can break an actor apart. . . ."

"I never had worries about Jack Nicholson and never considered anybody else for the role of R. P. McMurphy. 'Studio boys didn't pressure me to have star for McMurphy, but it seemed to me that this is precisely a role which requires one, box office aside. Jack's character must represent, for audience, a man from the real world entering the looney bin, a world unknown to it, he must be played by actor everybody is used to identifying with, like Jack."

In addition, Forman had known Nicholson for years. "And I ask you who, working, has such range? Who is so not after projecting a personal screen persona? Who is still taking such risks? Who is after parts which never repeat what he did before? It made me very nervous, watching Jack in 'Chinatown.' I'd already decided on him for 'Cuckoo' and the character in Polanski's movie was so opposite. I had to keep in mind the range."

It has been reported that Nicholson, at work, can be problematic, that he gets restive when a director orders many takes of the same scene. On "Cuckoo," says Forman, that was not the case. "I dislike to do many takes of any scene. If you have cast properly, you don't need to. If Jack and I have any conflict, it's that he wants more takes. I'd say, 'That one's fine with me,' he'd say, 'Naw, it was still static.' See, I thought McMurphy should always be less wise, less a con man, more ambiguous, possibly more looney than Jack did, so at the beginning we decide that when we disagree, we shoot it both his way and mine. And, funny, half the time, almost exactly, I am right and so is he. He will do anything, Jack. I sometimes love using non-professionals. Some people you watch, it's simply an accident of fate whether or not they became actors, or, say, doctors. This was true of Dr. Spivey, who's real head of that Oregon institution. I saw he would be wunnerful playing himself, and I ask him to do so, to just do his job on Jack as he would any incoming patient. I ask Jack to screen-test with him on that, Jack says, 'Oh sure,' and believe me, a lotta superstars you would never ask to do this. And we get the scene right on one take. Spivey needs no direction!"

In a sense this was true, too, of Louise Fletcher, who plays Nurse Ratched, the ward's supervisor, a character frequently described as sadistic. Mention of that snaps Forman up off the sofa, chopping the air with his right hand in a way which suggests that publicity releases claiming he possesses a karate black belt aren't studio-flack fantasy. "Ratched, obviously, is not sadistical, only fanatical. She is people we know. She believes totally that she is helping and serving these ill men. She's like a tyrant who, you know, believes in doing the best for his people, and is crushed to discover he has not! I say to Louise, 'Maybe Ratched's sick, I dunno, but when working she is only one thing—dedicated to preserving the rules of the mental institution which have so far always made it work.'"

Why did he cast Louise Fletcher? "An instinct. Her peculiar detachment. Louise, nobody knows this, came to Hollywood many years ago, too tall and flat-chested and couldn't even get an agent. She did do a little TV, then quit, went with her husband to London to live and raise kids, didn't act for eight years, came back to do 'Thieves Like Us,' and the instant I saw her in that I wanted her for Ratched. Maybe it's this: if Louise had stayed in Hollywood playing bits, she would have become too practiced at giving too much, she'd not have that removal I wished. All I say to her was 'Louise, this is vital, Jack's part has everything going for it. You have no lines to work with, nothing, only this incredible fanaticism which we can never stress or overplay."

Clearly, he got what he wanted from Louise Fletcher, if not from Haskell Wexler, the well known cinematographer whom he fired in mid-production. This is how Forman explains it: "With me, story comes first, and actors, and when you have as strong a story as 'Cuckoo,' the action should almost frame itself; you don't have to much calculate framing, you should have going an almost automatic simplicity of composition. Now Haskell, though brilliant, if you'd let him he'd exchange the actors for puppets, which would less disturb his lighting and camera angles. Give me similar choice and I'd get rid of the camera, because it always intrudes upon actors and story. Bill Butler, who replaced Haskell, understands this: that, sure, there is eternal conflict between director and cameraman, but it must remain fight which is healthy to the picture, constructive."

Forman is not the least interested in going over familiar ground—growing up in his war-ravaged homeland, his apprentice years in the Prague film school ("I'm not political. The government pays for you to learn movies. Why complain?")—or in discussing his next project, the film of "Hair." "So far, I only know this, that we have no 'Hair' script, no cast, only the original score, and that this story must be done as period piece, those kids as they think and behave in 60's."

Forman's salary for future films will undoubtedly soar if he wins an Oscar tomorrow night. "I honestly did not comprehend until coming to America that, here, everything is conceived for purpose of money. Sure, Oscar raises one's salary, which is of great interest, because money equals power equals freedom. An equation, correct word? But will money make me a whore? Listen, I was lucky, got much recognition from my first films but never money, so yet I dunno. For filmmaker from middle Europe, Oscar is still like winning Wimbledon. I maintain again, money is only important once you have it. What it means, I think, eventually, is comic. We shall see." ■

For Milos Forman, it all began with "Loves of a Blonde."

Dismemberment Of Things Past

King Kong with pal Frankenstein

By MARTIN E. MULLEN Jr.

Odd things are happening on our movie screens. Anachronistic outdoor telephone booths show up in "The Godfather" and "Hearts of the West." In "The Sting," set in 1936 Chicago, scam artist Paul Newman outhustles the canny Robert Shaw while wearing a 1945 snap-brim.

Are today's movie producers losing touch with the past? Or are we seeing the start of a new Hollywood era replete with garbled nostalgia? Are we in for the following?

"Titanic" — Fog-bound in the Pacific, a French motor launch with a mutinous crew aboard collides with a gigantic white whale. George Segal is Captain Queeg in this new version of Nordhoff and Hall's classic sea adventure.

"Anna Karenina"—Turgenev's story of a poor widow who loses her cloak and becomes an epileptic pales in color compared to RKO's 1940 black and white version. Dustin Hoffman as Pierre and Ali MacGraw as Grushenka strike fewer sparks than the original Lombard-Cagney fireworks. Eddie Albert, however, is outstanding as Napoleon.

"King Kong"—Reissue of the Howard Hawks comedy which chronicles the adventures of a runaway monkey in Manhattan. An ingeniously costumed Johnny Weissmuller is suitably mischievous in the title role. With Bela Lugosi as Dr. Frankenstein and Fay Wray as Jane.

"The Gold Rush"—A Disney Studios update of the famous silent comedy, in which deadpan funnyman Harold Lloyd stole a locomotive in the middle of the Boer War. Bob Cummings is Captain Nemo.

"It Happened One Night"—In the 1930's, Cecil B. DeMille brought this Old Testament epic to the screen with Paul Muni and Sylvia Sidney. In the newly released Universal-International production, Yul Brynner and Goldie Hawn topple the walls of Jericho by moonlight in the climactic battle sequence filmed on location in Spain.

"All Quiet On The Western Front"—The beloved Rudolf Friml operetta is now an R-rated bedroom farce. In this version, the hero (Woody Allen) gets the butterfly (Liza Minnelli).

No, movie producers just aren't what they used to be. Will we ever again be treated to such authentic film classics as "Gone with the Wind," Sam Goldwyn's screen version of the best-selling John Steinbeck novel? You remember—it was about the dust bowl. ■

Through the years (since 1914 at Greenwich House, the Washington Irving High School, the works of Greenberg Park's Washington Square Arts and ensembles have appeared for what many of them consider the City's most devoted and enthusiastic audience. Today, eighteen concerts are presented annually (with one series on Sunday afternoons at Town Hall and tickets priced as low as $1.25) on subscription. Woodshedding With the Juilliard

Jack Mitchell

After 30 years, still a standard for every other string quartet

By ALLEN HUGHES

At 30, the Juilliard retains one original member, the buoyant, curly-haired Robert Mann, 55, remarkably unchanged since the day in 1946 that William Schuman, fresh into the presidency of the Juilliard School, summoned him to discuss the establishment of a resident quartet, something the school had never had before. Mann's colleagues have shifted over the years—he likes to compare the evolution of the group to a stockpot kept simmering as ingredients are added and portions taken away—and his oldest comrade now is second violinist Earl Carlyss, 36, who joined ten years ago (succeeding Isidore Cohen, who had followed Robert Koff). Violinist Samuel Rhodes, 35, joined in 1969 (succeeding Raphael Hillyer), and the new man on the team is cellist Joel Krosnick, 35, who succeeded Claus Adam in 1974 (Adam had taken over from Arthur Winograd).

While constancy of membership is prized by ensembles who have it, Bob Mann isn't the least bothered by the changes within the Juilliard. "I was interested to notice in Grove's Dictionary of Music just the other day that the Joachim Quartet had changes paced at just about the same rate as ours. And there is one thing to keep in mind: most quartets search out their age-peers for replacements, because they're the ones they feel most comfortable with. We haven't done that. The Quartet itself will have a continuity because we won't all be 65 at the same time.

"It occurred to me with a shock not long ago that quartets like the Guarneri and even the Cleveland, which we think of as being so young, have an average age level about the same as ours. I think the Guarneri, in fact, is a little older."

Cellist Krosnick made a further point: "Every member brings in something of his own. When I joined, I was never told, 'This is the way we do this passage.' We worked on everything from a fresh point of view."

As the stockpot has bubbled, the famous Juilliard style, according to Mann, has not changed drastically. "Some aspects of our style are the same—our comprehension of structure, of what a piece is about, of what gives it coherence—this hasn't changed. We listened to an old recording of ours of the Bartók Fourth not long ago and we loved it. In terms of what we believe in, we still agree.

"If there has been a shift, it's been in tone quality. In the beginning we would willingly slash through the music to create drive and energy. That's what we were criticized for, often, and if you wanted Apollonian reflectiveness in those days you stuck to the Budapest. And of course they had been criticized for the same thing in their earlier days. It's a generational thing. In any case, today we may approach tone quality in a more fulsome way, without sacrificing the structural points. And we've slowed down just a little."

The members of the Juilliard—who, for audiences around the world, probably personify the American quartet—scoff at the suggestion that there is a typically high-geared American style of playing as opposed to a more tempered or serene European style. "You can't pigeonhole a quartet, they're all different," says Carlyss firmly.

Still, Mann relents a little on one point: "There may be a difference in the bowing. Possibly the Europeans use greater bow-speed and play less into the string, with a little less bite. It's the difference between Milstein, who has considerable bow speed and not so much pressure, and Heifetz, who has bite. But don't forget, that's not a difference of nationality—they're both Russians!"

There is no question that the Juilliard Quartet has had a profound influence on the course of chamber music in this country, in building audiences, in sponsoring new works, in training new quarters (the LaSalle, the Tokyo, the Concord were all founded under the watchful eye of Mann and his colleagues, and members of the Cleveland also studied with them). Besides the Pulitzer-winning Carter Third Quartet, the ensemble has premiered works by Foss, Copland, Babbitt, Sessions, Mennin and Schuman, among others. It was the first quartet to play a Bartók cycle in the United States (in 1948) and it was instrumental in reviving the Schoenberg quartets, beginning in 1949.

"When we were founded," Mann says, "the major thrust of chamber music was totally European—there were the Budapest, the London, the Pro Arte, the Griller, among others. We were the only quartet with a strong interest in 20th-century music. Of course the Kolisch had been tremendously important in giving first performances of Schoenberg, but they disbanded in 1942. In a sense we were committed equally to old music and new—we had no prejudices, we loved Schoenberg and Bartók as much as Beethoven and Brahms.

"Every group is influenced by somebody, I suppose, and our guru, our inspiration—and he still is an inspiration—is one of the most interesting musicians I've ever known, Eugene Lehner. He was violist of the Kolisch, and he plays in the Boston Symphony now. We played everything for him, and through him we imbibed the most creative impulses of what was happening in contemporary music. Lehner pushed us to explore difficult music. One is always faced in life, I think, with a choice of two directions—to take the comfortable, beautiful, pleasant way, or to strive, to try to keep developing. I suppose you can call it the Apollonian and the Dionysian principles. Often people settle for the Apollonian, not because they're trying to reach greatness but because it is easier. Lehner always pushed us. So we played Schoenberg."

The Juilliard is playing its complete Beethoven cycle four times this season, once in New York and three more on tour, and they plan to do four more next season. They recoil at the suggestion that it might get boring. "Never," says Krosnick. "We're constantly changing things, and we're rehearsing all the time. With Beethoven you can't let up for one second, either musically or technically. If your concentration slips, you get socked."

And Mann adds: "Beethoven is always incomplete. The music grows, is being developed, at every performance. Ravel, for instance, is different. It is beautiful, it is pleasing, and that's it. But with Beethoven one always strives." ■

New Sounds From an Old Instrument

John Stern

By JOAN PEYSER

Although he considers himself both a composer and a performer, it is as an experimenter with the flute that Harvey Sollberger is now making his mark. Sollberger has expanded the potential of the traditionally pure-toned flute into an instrument capable of producing new kinds of sounds.

Composers seem to be writing more music for the "new" flute than any other instrument, and Sollberger will display some of these unusual sounds at a concert tomorrow night given by the Group for Contemporary Music. The program, entitled "Explorations of the Contemporary Flute," will feature six compositions, all written in the past 25 years, including one of his own works: "Riding the Wind" for amplified flute, violin, cello and piano.

The concert at Alice Tully Hall will be the first downtown performance for the Group, one of the earliest ensembles in the United States devoted to 20th-century music. The Group, which Sollberger codirects with the avant-garde composer Charles Wuorinen, began in 1962 as a means for graduate composers at Columbia University to hear well-played performances of their own compositions. Until now Sollberger has lived his professional life in the shadow of Wuorinen, who earned a Pulitzer Prize in composition in 1970, and whose aggressive attacks on people in high places have always made lively journalistic copy.

Sollberger's training was conventional, and he is not sorry: "One should not bypass traditional training. But there are more alternatives than the tradition suggests. Students are generally exposed to 50 fingering to handle the combinations of the diatonic and chromatic scales. Yet there are close to 16,000 combinations, so many thousands of possibilities that have not yet been explored. C above middle C, for instance, is generally an open note on the flute. There are at least a dozen other fingerings which would obtain the same pitch but alter the sound in clearly recognizeable ways. One can render a sound narrow and tight; another can make it wide and fuzzy. Each has its own very striking ambiance."

Born in Iowa in 1938, Sollberger began to study the flute at 12, but he remained untouched by contemporary music until, at the University of Iowa, he first played Samuel Barber's Second Symphony. Then Luciano Berio visited the school and brought a tape of his own "Sequenza" for flute, played by Severino Gazzeloni. "I'd been waiting for that work without knowing it," Sollberger says. "It was unlike anything I had ever heard. It involved modes of playing, a continuity of articulation that was different from anything I'd ever known. Gazzeloni was a catalyst for a whole generation. He did more than any other flutist to stimulate composers of his own time."

Many virtuosos have turned away from the new. Jean-Pierre Rampal commissioned Boulez's Sonatina for Flute (composed in 1946) but never played it. Indeed, it was not performed until 1954, when Gazzeloni played it in Darmstadt. Here the pitch range extends up to the hard-to-reach high F. Sollberger says that chromatic fingerings up to high F sharp are possible and that musicians wishing to play the recent literature must become familiar with them.

Sollberger teaches at the Manhattan School of Music (where the Group moved when Columbia withdrew its support). There, he says, it is possible for a student majoring in the flute to receive his degree without ever playing 20th-century music. The traditional repertoire, Sollberger points out, requires an "ideal sound" which contains virtually no variety in the vibrato. "There is a uniformity, a homogeneity in the sound in which the vibrato is used indiscriminately, like a pastry chef putting whipped cream on everything he makes. This kind of playing is encouraged everywhere. Conservatories press for required pieces in the tradition of 'The Fifty Great Melodies.' Flute students must play the Mozart concertos, the Prokofiev and Bach sonatas, the Schubert variations and so forth."

Sollberger acknowledged that "avant-garde" techniques can be used in a banal way—but that, of course, is not what he has in mind when he teaches his students how to produce accurate microtones (anything less than a half-tone), how to make several notes sound simultaneously (it has to do with fingerings and embouchure), how to work the key clicks Varèse first required in his "Density 21.5" and Berio asked for later in the "Sequenza," how to generate the buzz tones at the low end of the register, and how to change the timbre of a pitch by "altering the balance of air pressure and embouchure."

Last year Sollberger and his wife, Sophie, also a master flutist, moved to 60 acres on the northern edge of the Catskills, with their young daughters, Anna and Eva. There they grow and preserve their own food and heat the buildings with firewood. For two weeks last summer, the rolling fields became a pedagogical "flute farm," and Sollberger plans for it to become an annual event. What he hopes to impress on his students is the range of possibilities of the flute today. "It's easy enough to have a mad scientist come in and transform the whole machine. But it's more attractive to redesign it in my mind. Music is, after all, a mental phenomenon."

Why is Sollberger abandoning the Manhattan School tomorrow night in favor of Lincoln Center, the "Establishment" complex he has always professed to abhor? "The key word is extension," he says. "I believe in extension as a flutist, as a composer, and in the geographical-social sense as well." ■

Next Season at the Met—The Accent Will Be French

Crespin. New York is familar with the "Dialogues," which was in the New York City Opera repertory for a while.

As for Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète," the third of the French novelties, it has not been heard at the Metropolitan Opera since 1928. There was a time when it was basic repertory there. At the turn of the century, the Meyerbeer operas were ensconced in every opera house in the world. "Le Prophète," composed in 1849, came to the Metropolitan Opera in 1889, and was later enhanced by such superstars as Jean de Reszke and Lilli Lehmann. How's this for a cast (Jan. 10, 1900): Schumann-Heink as Fidès, Suzanne Adams as Bertha, Edouard de Reszke as Zacharias, Pol Plançon as Oberthal, Albert Alvarez as John of Leyden. . . . Makes one shiver. Later on there were casts that had Caruso, Matzenauer, Muzio, Didur and Mardones. The quartet of principals in next season's "Prophète" will be Marilyn Horne, Renata Scotto, James McCracken and Jerome Hines. Henry Lewis will conduct.

Which brings us to the power of the prima donna. Who is more important to a production: the leading singer or the conductor? The question is not an idle one at the Metropolitan these days. Two of the leading sopranos there are married to conductors. Henry Lewis and Marilyn Horne are husband and wife; so are Joan Sutherland and Richard Bonynge. It will come as no surprise to discover that Bonynge has been named as the conductor of "Esclarmonde." No Bonynge, no Sutherland. But neither Bonynge nor Lewis is one of the great manipulators of the baton, and they would not be at the Metropolitan Opera except under certain special circumstances. So what to do? What would you do if you had to deal with the problem?

The other three new productions will be "Lohengrin," "La Bohème" and "Lulu." "Bohème" comes from the Lyric Opera of Chicago and will feature Renata Scotto and Luciano Pavarotti. Ten years or so ago there was much talk about interchange of productions among major American opera houses, but little actual fertilization along the San Francisco-Chicago-New York axis has taken place. There is no good reason why opera houses cannot pool resources, and one hopes they will do much more of it.

"Lohengrin" will introduce René Kollo to America. He is the German heldentenor who has appeared on so many records, and in a world where the heldentenor is a species akin to whooping crane and other disappearing fauna, he will be heard with special interest.

With Alban Berg's "Lulu," conducted by James Levine, and with Teresa Stratas (Lulu), Tatiana Troyanos (Geschwitz)) and Donald Gramm (Schoen) in key roles, the Metropolitan Opera is taking a deliberate gamble. Modern opera never has gone well at the house. "The Rake's Progress" and "Wozzeck" never came near paying their way; and in an unsubsidized house, that can be a body blow.

But "Lulu" has never been staged by either the Metropolitan Opera or the New York City Opera, though it is near-repertory in many of the world's opera houses and has been done elsewhere in the United States outside of New York. (Recently it received a production in Houston, and the management warned its clientele that the work was "Recommended for Mature Audiences." There is a lesbian in the cast.) Thus it is a feather in the Metropolitan's old, conservative cap that, however belatedly, "Lulu" is being staged there.

Sutherland will star in 'Esclarmonde,' Crespin in 'Les Dialogues des Carmelites'

What a pity that the entire work is not being given! Berg left it unfinished. Two of the three acts are complete. The third exists with a complete libretto, sections of short score and many sketches. Berg authorities, such as the American composer and theorist, George Perle, say that it would be no great problem to put a third act together that would closely approximate what Berg had in mind.

The trouble is that Mrs. Berg, the composer's widow, has all of the material and will not release it for publication. It is said that she feels she is in direct communion with her husband's spirit, and he has told her that the last act should not be completed. It is to be hoped that Universal Edition, Berg's publishers, have at the very least photocopies of the material presently held by Mrs. Berg. It would be a tragedy if those sketches were lost.

Next season at the Metropolitan will run 27 weeks (the same as this one). One way of looking at the announced repertory is on a percentage basis. For instance, about 33 percent of the entire repertory of 20 operas consists of new productions. That is a very high percentage. A less imposing statistic is imbedded in those 20 operas: it is one of the smallest repertories of any major opera house in the world.

In case you missed the news, the season will open on Oct. 11 with Verdi's "Il Trovatore," conducted by Gianandrea Gavazzeni in his Metropolitan Opera debut. The principals will be Pavarotti, Scotto, Verrett and Manuguerra. Opera buffs will be complaining, as they always do, that the season will not bring to the house enough of the world's great opera singers. There will be the usual fulminations about the conducting staff. Cries about lack of rehearsal and other musical preparation will be heard. All of which will be true, to greater or lesser extent, just as it is true of almost any great opera house in the world. Somehow the Metropolitan Opera will survive.

Correction: In the March 14 article about Leo Ornstein, "A Musical Futurist Rediscovered," the name of the pianist who will play the Piano Concerto this December in New Haven with the Yale Symphony was incorrect. William Westney, the top prize-winner in the 1975 Geneva Competition, will be the soloist.

"Denver's singing style appeals to grandparents and teenyboppers, rednecks and suburbanites." (Grace Lichtenstein)

The Wholesome Guru of Pop Music

ample of what is known as "crossover" — a performer whose eclectic style crosses conventional boundaries and therefore appeals to diverse audiences. Denver started as a folkie, replacing Chad Mitchell in 1964 when the Mitchell trio was a hot act. Two and a half years later when he went out on his own, Denver was still very much in the folk-rock bag. His first songwriting hit, as recorded by Peter, Paul and Mary, was "Leaving on a Jet Plane." Later, he had his own first million-seller with "Take Me Home, Country Roads" in 1971.

But after trying on folk, rock, country, middle-of-the-road and even gospel hits in his early solo albums, he has fused both his singing and songwriting into a style that appeals to the grandparents along with the teenyboppers, and the rednecks along with the suburbanites. On his upcoming television special, he'll try still another field, singing duets with Sinatra in front of the Dorsey, Nelson Riddle and Count Basie bands. The idea is to win over the aunts and uncles, if they haven't already become Denver fans from his appearances on the Merv Griffin and "Tonight" shows.

With Denver's success has come plenty of sneers from critics and serious pop listeners who feel his music packs about as much punch as a vanilla malted. Robert Cristgau of the Village Voice calls Denver a "rank hypocrite," going on to say: "He's written a few good songs and he is a very professional entertainer. But his philosophical concept of the world—selling the notion of pastoral isolation to a mass audience—is so full of contradictions I can't believe he doesn't see it himself."

Denver's subject matter—his paeans to the joys of the natural world, the beauty of the mountains, to flowers, children, innocence and romantic love—seems to touch a need in his listeners for a return to the simple life. Songs like "Rocky Mountain High," "Sunshine on My Shoulders" and "Take Me Home, Country Roads," combined with Denver's sweet folkie voice, and his wholesome-as-wheat-germ manner, appear to be irresistible.

"I think people see themselves in me," Denver says in trying to account for his popularity. "The music is of a kind that touches people of all different ages, from all different backgrounds. People are finding value in it that's more than just entertainment, more than just pretty." He takes another sip of orange juice, leans forward in his white fisherman sweater, and continues.

"For a long time now it hasn't been okay to acknowledge certain things about yourself. For example, that you love your old lady. That it feels good to be out in the sunshine. That every once in a while on a rainy day you feel sad. That life is good. As I have been able to communicate those things for myself and to reach a large audience, that gives them support in feeling those things . . . Nobody else is singing these songs. Everybody else is talking about how hard life is, and here I am singing about how good it is to be alive!"

Denver's songs have been used in wedding ceremonies and religious sermons. "Every place but massage parlors," says his publicist. What disturbs many listeners is the relentless uplift in Denver's music as well as the gap between the reality of the wilderness and the fantasy he makes of it in his songs.

The "Sweet Rocky Mountain Paradise" he sings of in "Starwood in Aspen" turns out to be an exclusive development of private homes high above the town of Aspen itself, its road protected from intruders by a guard in a wooden bunker. Paradise, perhaps. But for whom? What is one to make of a man who sings, "Love is everywhere, I see it/You are all that you can be, go on and be it/Life is perfect, I believe it"?

With considerable charm and intelligence, Denver attempts to define his optimism. "Perfection has nothing to do with not making mistakes," he says, earnestly. "I'm not a negative person. I choose to see value whenever I can."

He speaks of "aliveness"—a word he picked up from his friend Werner Erhard, the guru of est. He speaks of "creating space" in which to find himself, of "moving through" problems rather than being stuck in them. He points out that he does mention suffering in his most recent single—"Sometimes I fly like an eagle/Sometimes I'm deep in despair."

How does he justify the apparent conflict between his love of nature and the manipulative world of television through which he conveys that love?

"Television perhaps is more than what people think it is," he says slowly. "I refuse to limit my opportunity to communicate by other people's perception of the media that I'm using. Television is an incredible, mind-blowing, possibly devastating, sometimes uplifting medium and it reaches a whole lot of people with its worst and its best. I hope to make my contribution on the 'best' end."

Having conquered folk, country and MOR-rock audiences, he says that he's taking aim via television at the middle-aged Las Vegas market. His television work, especially the 24-minute medley he'll do on the new special with Sinatra, complete with tuxedo, is "a very conscious effort" to win this audience. (It should be noted that the two men are handled by the same manager, Jerry Weintraub, who successfully put Denver and Sinatra on a separate-but-equal bill in a Lake Tahoe cabaret last summer.)

The thought of this marriage between Hoboken and Aspen, scotch and orange juice, pizza pie and apple pie may strike one as intriguing or nauseating. Isn't Denver satisfied with the comfortable niche he's already carved for himself? Isn't he afraid of rupturing his identity or hurting his clean-cut image? "I don't care," he responds disarmingly. "I intend to expand and to grow, period. I'm not afraid of losing any audience, as long as there are people who find value in what I'm doing." ■

John Denver: "Love is everywhere. I see it. Life is perfect, I believe it."

G General audiences. All ages admitted.

PG Parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for pre-teenagers.

R Restricted. Under 17 requires accompanying parent or adult guardian.

X No one under 17 admitted. (Age limit may vary in certain areas.)

Opening This Week

FACE TO FACE—Ingmar Bergman's film about a capable, well-adjusted young woman who attempts suicide. Liv Ullmann stars. (No rating) Opens next Sun.

MAHLER—Ken Russell's version of the life of the composer. Robert Powell and Georgina Hall star. (PG) Opens next Sun.

SALSA—A movie about Latin rock shown through two large-scale concerts in New York and Puerto Rico. Directed by Jerry Masucci and Leon Gast. Ray Barretto, Mongo Santamaria, Willie Colon appear. (No rating) Opens Wed.

W.C. FIELDS AND ME—A film about the life and times of the great comedian, based on the book by Carlotta Monti. Directed by Arthur Hiller, Rod Steiger and Valerie Perrine star. (PG) Opens Wed.

Current

THE ADVENTURE OF SHERLOCK HOLMES' SMARTER BROTHER—"A charming slapstick comedy that honors Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's original creation as much by what it doesn't do as by what it does do . . . a marvelously lowbrow caper." (Canby) Directed by Gene Wilder, with Mr. Wilder, Marty Feldman, Madeline Kahn, Dom DeLuise. (PG)

ALL SCREWED UP—Lina Wertmuller's film about the adventures of a group of young country people who have come to Milan to make their fortunes. "It is a noisy, anary, relentlessly zazag comedy that leaves one exhausted . . . Lina Wertmuller has become one of the major film talents of our day." (Canby) In Italian. (PG)

BARRY LYNDON—An 18th-century comedy of manners that centers around the rise and fall of a poor, good-natured Irish opportunist. Directed by Stanley Kubrick, with Ryan O'Neal and Marisa Berenson. "Mr. Kubrick has spent a fortune on the film and it shows, not only in the care that's been taken in locations (England, Ireland and Germany), in the grand houses and in the battle scenes, but also in the photography of John Alcott." (Canby) (PG)

THE BLACK BIRD—George Segal as Sam Spade Jr., who has inherited his father's private-eye business, a waiting room full of kooky clients he does his best to avoid and the Maltese Falcon wrapped in a Miami Beach towel and stashed in a file cabinet. "Delight turns to affection, which turns to tolerance, which turns to a wish that all these funny people would go home." (Eder) Written and directed by David Giler. (PG)

BLAZING SADDLES—Mel Brooks' knock-about farce about a black sheriff (Cleavon Little) and his white sidekick (Gene Wilder). Young moviegoers delight in its zaniness, although The Times was less than ecstatic: "One remembers along with the good sans the film's desperate, boot-crushing efforts to be funny." (Canby) (R)

CONFRONTATION—Swiss director Rolf Lyssy's film about a Yugoslav Jew who leaves his medical studies in Germany during the rise of Hitler and goes to Switzerland where he kills a Nazi leader. It's too long. It is hard to take, and the endless pulls it out of shape. But on the way Mr. Lyssy accomplishes some remarkable things." (Eder) In German. (No rating)

THE DEVIL'S RAIN—A horror film about a devil-priest and his congregation of eyeless zombies taking revenge against a family whose forebears did them wrong. "It is as horrible as watching an egg fry." (Eder) Ernest Borgnine, Eddie Albert, Ida Lupino, Keenan Wynn head the cast. Directed by Robert Fuest. (PG)

DOG DAY AFTERNOON—A melodrama, based on fact, about a disastrously ill-planned Brooklyn bank robbery. Directed by Sidney Lumet. This "is Mr. Lumet's most accurate, most flamboyant New York movie." Al Pacino, John Cazale and James Broderick head the cast. (R)

EMMANUELLE THE JOYS OF A WOMAN—A pornographic film about a rich couple who practice multilateral sex. Directed by Francis Giacobetti, with Sylvia Kristel. "Sylvia Kristel has a sexy face and an expression that suggests all kinds of improper things. When she goes on to do these things they are less interesting." (Eder) (X)

THE FORTUNE—Mike Nichols's farce about two con-men (Warren Beatty and Jack Nicholson) who attempt to separate an heiress (Stockard Channing) from her family and then from her money. "Very funny, maniacally scatterbrained . . . an owlz version of those old two-reel comedies that I associate with Saturday afternoon moviegoing in the thirties." (Canby) (PG)

FREEBIE AND THE BEAN—A comedy starring Alan Arkin and James Caan as San Francisco police detectives. "Otherwise good actors doing bits of business . . . as if they thought they could upstage all of the movie's automobiles, which are seldom still." (Canby) Directed by Richard Rush. (R)

GABLE AND LOMBARD—The somewhat reworked story of the Hollywood courtship and marriage of Clark Gable and Carole Lombard in the late thirties and early forties. Directed by Sidney J. Furie, with James Brolin and Jill Clayburgh. The film "recalls not 'Gone With the Wind,' 'Honky Tonk,'... but cliches culled from the worst movies of that period." (Canby) (R)

GIVE 'EM HELL, HARRY! — A filmed version of James Whitmore's one-man monologue re-creation of Harry S. Truman. Directed by Peter H. Hunt. "Mr. Whitmore may suffer the disadvantage of playing a stage part on the screen, but it is a first-rate stage performance . . . In the end, it captivates and even moves." (Eder) (No rating)

GREY GARDENS—A documentary about two lonely and tormented recluses, Edith Bouvier Beale and her daughter Edie, living in a decayed mansion in Long Island. Directed by David and Albert Maysles, Ellen Hovde and Muffie Meyer. "There is no doubt about the artistry and devotion the Maysles have used . . . But the moviegoer will still feel like an exploiter." (Eder) (PG)

HESTER STREET—Joan Micklin Silver's film about the comic and painful Americanization of an immigrant couple from Russia. Richard Eder felt the acting was superlative as well as the whole framing of the picture: "the rhythms, the acute selection of incident and character." Steven Keats and Carol Kane star. (PG)

THE HINDENBURG—"It makes considerably implausible a perfectly plausible theory about the events that led up to May 6, 1937, when the German dirigible Hindenburg, the Titanic of all lighter-than-air craft, exploded and burned while landing at Lakehurst, N.J. Yet I wouldn't have missed a single foolish frame of it." (Canby) Directed by Robert Wise. With George C. Scott, Anne Bancroft, Gig Young, Burgess Meredith. (PG)

THE HUMAN FACTOR—A film about an American computer expert in Naples, who resorts to vigilante justice when his wife and children are slaughtered by terrorists. Directed by Edward Dymtryk. "Despite technological trappings, political innuendo and colorful Italian locales (it) evolves as a manipulated affair." (Weiler) George Kennedy, John Mills, Raf Vallone head the cast. (R)

IMMORAL TALES—Walerian Borowczyk's compilation of films based on four erotic stories, and featuring simulated sex and sophisticated fascination for the female nude. "The work of a talented filmmaker who examines his obsessions as he enthusiastically, often solemnly, indulges them." (Canby) With Paloma Picasso. In French. (X)

Arts and Leisure Guide

JAWS—The film version of Peter Benchley's novel about a man-eating great white shark that terrorizes an East Coast resort community. "It has been cleverly directed by Steven Soielberg for maximum shock impact and short-term suspense, and the special effects are so good that the mechanical sharks are as convincing as the people." (Canby) Roy Scheider, Robert Shaw and Richard Dreyfuss star. (PG)

KILLER FORCE—"This was a passable adventure picture about some crooks trying to smuggle diamonds from a formidably defended South African mine. Then someone hit it with a load of moral ambiguity, and it all caved in." (Eder) Directed by Val Guest. With Peter Fonda, Telly Savalas, Maud Adams. (PG)

LIES MY FATHER TOLD ME—"Jud Allen's dramatization of remembrances of his own Jewish family in the Montreal melting pot of a half-century ago is brought appealingly alive with the aid of Jan Kadar's perceptive direction and some strong, natural performances." (Weiler) (PG)

THE LOVES AND TIMES OF SCARAMOUCHE—A film, set more or less during the French Revolution, about a scoundrel who gets tangled up in a plot to assassinate Napoleon. Directed by Enzo Castellari. "This tedious, lumpy, inept effort to do still another comic take-off on historical swashbuckliery is as bad as imprisonment." (Eder) Michael Sarrazin and Ursula Andress star. (PG)

THE MAGIC FLUTE—Ingmar Bergman's film version of the Mozart opera. "An absolutely dazzling film entertainment... full of beauty, intelligence, wit and fun." (Canby) In Swedish. (G)

THE MAN WHO WOULD BE KING—A film based on Rudyard Kipling's short story about two former English soldiers formed con artists, who decide to carve out their own kingdom in a territory near a part of Afghanistan. John Huston's movie "manages to be great fun in itself while being most faithful to Kipling." (Canby) Michael Caine, Sean Connery star. (PG)

MOSES—With Burt Lancaster in the title role. Directed by Gianfranco De Bosio. (PG)

MY MICHAEL — An Israeli movie about the disintegration of a marriage between a young teacher and an archeology student in Jerusalem. Directed by Dan Wolman. "The problem is the film's deliberate attenuation, its deadpan development of married banality in a painfully banal style." (Eder) (No rating)

NASHVILLE—Robert Altman's "panoramic movie whose style and substance are both a reflection of and a comment upon the country-and-western music with which it is so brilliantly scored. . . . It's the most original and free-flowing film yet from this most eccentric, most sophisticated, most regional of American directors." (Canby) Ronee Blakley, Henry Gibson, Lily Tomlin and Karen Black head the cast. (R)

NEXT STOP GREENWICH VILLAGE—Paul Mazursky's film about a nice young Jewish boy from Brooklyn who seeks fame and fortune as an actor in Greenwich Village in the early 1950's. "All of the performers are good and some are exceptionally good...but the film that Mazursky creates for them is less a recollection than a deja-vu, so awkwardly and obviously constructed that you want to cringe for the actors at the worst moments." (Canby) (R)

ONE FLEW OVER THE CUCKOO'S NEST—Milos Forman's film, based on Ken Kesey's 1962 novel, about Randle Patrick McMurphy, who has gone from a prison farm to a psychiatric hospital for observation. The story is the duel between Randle (Jack Nicholson) and Nurse Ratched (Louise Fletcher) for the remnants of the minds of the other patients. The movie "is at its best when Mr. Forman is exercising his talents as a director of exuberant comedy that challenges preconceived notions of good taste." (Canby) (R)

RACE WITH THE DEVIL—A film about a quartet of vacationers who are pursued by a band of devil worshippers. "This is a ridiculous mishmash of a movie for people who never grew up, which is not to say it's for children." (Canby) Directed by Jack Starrett. Peter Fonda and Warren Oates star. (PG)

RETURN TO MACON COUNTY—A film about three young people who set out for California to make their fortunes in a supercharged stock car in the 1950's. One of the troubles with the movie "is that no sooner do its young protagonists begin to charm than the viewer begins to wait voluptuously to see where the bullet holes will appear." (Eder) Directed by Richard Compton, with Nick Nolte, Don Johnson, Robin Mattson. (PG)

ROBIN AND MARIAN—A film based on the conviction of screenwriter James Goldman that Robin Hood and Maid Marian lived happily ever after in Sherwood Forest for no more than a year and that Robin then took off on a crusade with Little John. "A very appealing, contradictory sort of movie, a spectacle and a satire that is most winning when it is being most straight as a somber love story," with the "wit, strength and sheer presences of Sean Connery and Audrey Hepburn in the title roles." (Canby) Directed by Richard Lester. (PG)

SALUT L'ARTISTE—A film about an actor (Marcello Mastroianni) who never quite makes it but who never stops working. Directed by Yves Robert. "Mr. Mastroianni's Nicholas is one of his best performances in a long time—witty, self-absorbed, vain, unsentimental—qualities shared with the movie that contains it." (Canby) In French. (No rating)

SEVEN BEAUTIES — Lina Wertmuller's film about the survival of a Neapolitan dandy in a German concentration camp. "It's a disorderly epic, sadistic, unbeautiful to look at, as often harrowing as it is boisterously funny, though it has a solid substructure of common sense and precisely observed details from life." (Canby) Giancarlo Giannini and Fernando Rey star. (No rating)

SKY RIDERS—An adventure film about the rescue of a family from a mountaintop fortress where it is being held by a terrorist band. Directed by Douglas Hickox. James Coburn, Susannah York, Robert Cote head the cast. (PG)

SMILE—Michael Ritchie's comedy about an annual beauty contest in Santa Rosa, Calif., where conformism and positive thinking virtually amount to a political system. "A rollicking satire that misses few of the obvious targets, but without dehumanizing the victims." (Canby) With Bruce Dern. (PG)

THE STORY OF ADELE H.—Francois Truffaut's film about Adele Hugo (daughter of the French poet and patriot, Victor Hugo), whose passion for a young English officer is unrequited. "It's a poet's appreciation of the terrifying depth of Adele's feelings." (Canby) In French. (No rating)

THE STREET FIGHTER—A Japanese-made, English-dubbed import involving Sonny Chiba, a newcomer to the karate school of Oriental cinema, in a batch of bloody capers. (X)

THE SUNSHINE BOYS—An adaptation of Neil Simon's Broadway hit about the disastrous attempts to reconcile two old-time vaudevillians (George Burns and Walter Matthau) for a one-shot reunion of their act on a TV special. "It makes you grin almost continuously, laugh out loud on a number of occasions, and then, at the end, leaves you wondering if that's all there is." (Canby) Directed by Herbert Ross. (PG)

SWEPT AWAY—Lina Wertmuller's love story about a rich, beautiful Milanese and a swarthy Sicilian deckhand marooned on a deserted Mediterranean isle for several weeks. "By far the lightest, most successful fusion of Miss Wertmuller's two favorite themes, sex and politics." (Canby) Giancarlo Giannini, Mariangela Melato star. In Italian. (R)

TAXI DRIVER—Martin Scorsese's film about the life and dreams of a lonely psychotic New York taxi driver (Robert De Niro). "'Taxi Driver' is a vivid, galvanizing portrait of a character so particular that you may be astonished that he makes consistent dramatic sense." (Canby) (R)

THREE DAYS OF THE CONDOR—Sydney Pollack's movie about an eccentric link (Robert Redford) in the CIA chain of command, who wreaks more havoc on the agency than any House or Senate committee has done in years. "A good-looking, entertaining suspense film that is most effective when it's being most conventional." (Canby) With Faye Dunaway, Max Von Sydow, Cliff Robertson, John Houseman. (R)

VINCENT, FRANCOIS, PAUL AND THE OTHERS—Claude Sautet's film about the vicissitudes of friendship of three middle-aged, middle-class men whose lives in almost every other respect are failures. "The film is haunted by a genuine feeling of menace barely contained, of love that's run out, of futility, which have the effect of defining the meaning of friendship." (Canby) Yves Montand, Michel Piccoli, Gerard Depardieu, Stephane Audran head the cast. In French. (No rating)

W.W. AND THE DIXIE DANCEKINGS—John G. Avildsen's film about a hold-up man named W. W. (Burt Reynolds) and a third-rate, five-piece country band he adopts and guides in Grand Ole Opry stardom. "It's a skylarking sort of movie, full of good humor and naive optimism." (Canby) With Art Carney. (PG)

OUR LOW PRICE IS ONLY HALF THE STORY

WE WILL MEET OR BEAT ANY DOCUMENTED PRICE ON ANY BRAND WE CARRY FROM A DEALER OFFERING THE SAME OR SIMILAR SERVICES AS WE DO!

Here is the rest of the story

OUR PRICES

At Stereo Warehouse the prices are the lowest, and we'll beat any legitimate price you can get on any brand we carry. How do we do it? Easy! There's no magic and there's no secret. We are one of America's largest wholesale distributors. We buy directly from manufacturers in volume that cannot be matched by any other local retailer. In fact, we probably sell to them. As can be expected when buying in large quantities, we save money. We pass these savings on to you.

RELIABILITY

Some stores come and go. Not Stereo Warehouse. We've been around since 1951. This April marks our 25th year of reliable service. The fact that we've been around since 1951 attests to our reliability and reputation as America's #1 value leader.

SERVICE

Service Departments in other Hi-Fi stores are virtually nonexistent. Not at Stereo Warehouse. In fact, we operate two in store service facilities just to service our customers needs. We're an authorized repair agency for most major brands, and we operate a service "hot-line" to help when things go wrong. (212) 338-8548

SELECTION

Some audio stores limit your choice of equipment to just a few brands. Not at Stereo Warehouse. At Stereo Warehouse you can select from over 60 national brands. We're proud of the fact that we have more brands under one roof than any other dealer in the Metropolitan area. If you know what you want, chances are we have it!

PROTECTION

When you buy, you buy with confidence at Stereo Warehouse.
• All equipment brand new, factory sealed, fully warranteed.
• 30 days instant exchange on defective equipment
• "Rain-check policy." If we advertise something and we're sold out, we'll get that unit for you at the sale price.
• Warranties — Our service department stands behind all manufacturers warranties.

FREE CATALOG

If you can't make it down to one of our four convenient locations, write or call us for a free Stereo Warehouse catalog and four page "Hi-Fi" guide.

"Whatever happened to network programs designed specifically for children?" (John Leonard)

JOHN LEONARD

Old Sitcoms And Young Minds

cording to Proverbs (26:14): "As the door urneth upon its hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed." Actually, it was a chaise longue, onnived at by some plastics manufacturer o look like the corpse of a zebra. I was urning upon it the other Monday afternoon dren came home from school, as if from n accident, threw their coats and notebooks itched on the TV set so that it might warm pulled watermelons, potato sticks, Gatorade and leftover mucilage out of the icebox.

I stayed put, because I was thinking about Jimmy Carter's teeth: Had he borrowed them from Mary Tyler Moore? A charming scuffle—elbows and oaths—ensued. Would they watch "Mickey Mouse Club" or "Lassie," followed by "Batman" and "Superman" or "Lost in Space," followed by "The Brady Bunch" or "Gilligan's Island"? Before long, unhinged, I found I was looking at Florence Henderson's teeth. What office was she running for? She was running for the office of wife.

This turned out to be the episode of "The Brady Bunch" in which Miss Henderson (and her three daughters and a cat) married Robert Reed (and his three sons and a dog and Alice, the housekeeper)—in short, the Big Bang that created the Bunch. After which, entropy. I was pleased. I collect such moments. The nation's wounds are annealed in the heat of an eternal verity like marriage or childbirth. I had been there when Lucille Ball gave birth on "I Love Lucy" in 1954, and when Valerie Harper got married on "Rhoda" in 1974. In between, Mary Tyler Moore and Elizabeth Montgomery had children on "The Dick Van Dyke Show" and "Bewitched," while Don Adams took Barbara Feldon to be his bride on "Get Smart." Just recently, "Marcus Welby, M.D." married off the good doctor's hulking young associate, James Brolin. (No matter that Mr. Brolin now wants to leave the show to pursue a movie career. Considering his performance in "Gable and Lombard," he should leave the country instead.) How nice for the children that they are permitted to witness these moments from the past, TV's home movies.

In fact, there are very few moments from the TV past that our children will not witness, over and over again. Daytime television is a revolving door of the past or, turned on its side, a wheel of images in the cage of the afternoon, within which kids scamper like pet gerbils. As each old program reruns its course on one independent channel, it simply moves over to the next. A child of ten has memorized every episode of "I Love Lucy," "I Dream of Jeannie," "Gilligan's Island," "Superman," "Bewitched," "Leave It to Beaver," "The Partridge Family" and "The Flintstones," not to mention "Star Trek" and "The Mod Squad."

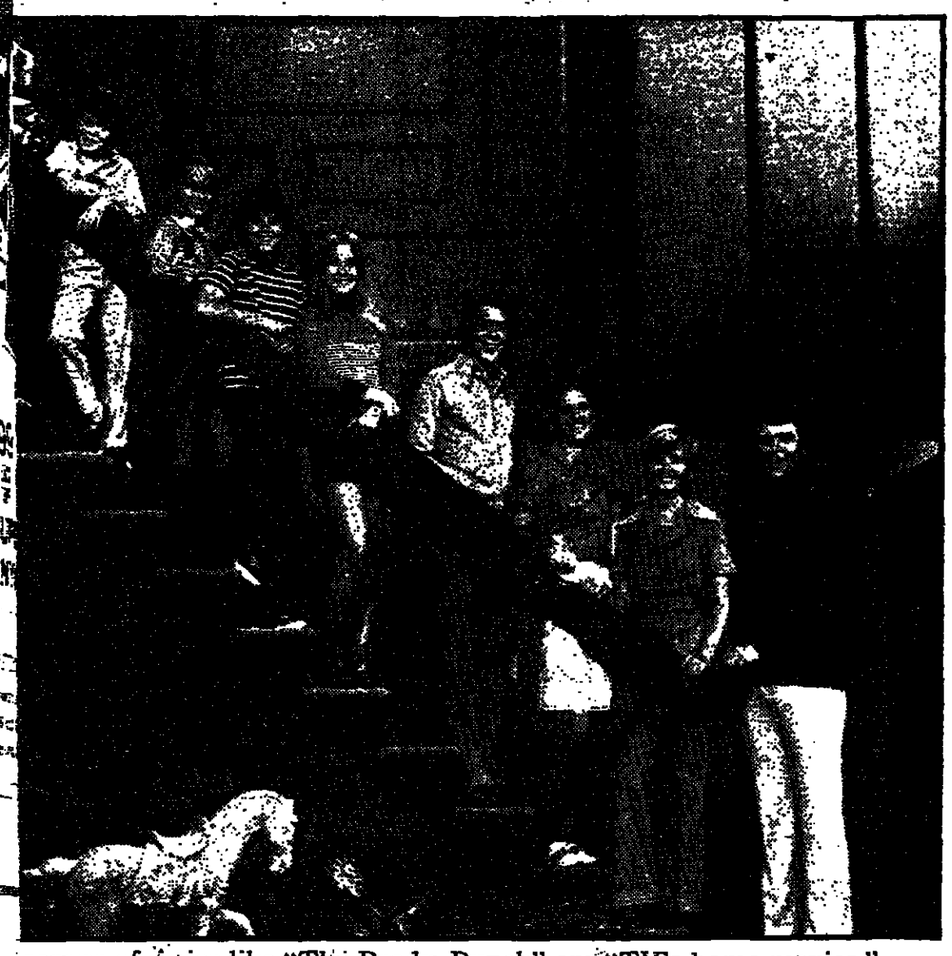
This is obvious and extraordinary at the same time. By and large, our children not only watch the same new programs that we watch, but they are scholars of everything that went before, everything we have forgotten or never knew. Twenty-five years of situation comedies and adventure programs are picked up between kindergarten and the fourth grade, in the archives of the afternoon. If, as the historian Daniel Boorstin has suggested, TV is in the business of manufacturing experience as well as entertainment, our children are as experienced as we are. They consume the banquet of our lives, little cannibals, as though it were a snack. With apologies to André Malraux, there is a "museum without walls" in every American livingroom. Two ruminations:

(1) While we work, sleep, drink or think about Jimmy Carter's teeth, our children, tethered to the TV hitching post, absorb the situation comedies of the 1950's and 1960's. The sitcom is a socializing agency, like the family and the public school system. It instructs us on how the culture expects us to behave. It seeks to internalize norms of virtue, standards of decency, codes of etiquette. Are we so sanguine about the values and perceptions of these programs—their portrayal, for instance, of women and fathers—that we let them mess up unformed minds?

(2) Whatever happened to network programs designed specifically for children? In the 1950's, we had "Howdy Doody," "Kukla, Fran & Ollie," "Time for Beany," "Zoo Parade," "Super Circus," "Pinky Lee," "Watch Mr. Wizard," "Rin Tin Tin," "Mickey Mouse Club," "Huckleberry Hound," "Big Top," "Lucky Pup," "Captain Video," "Juvenile Jury," "Leave It to Beaver" and Paul Winchell and his puppets, as well as the perennials ("Captain Kangaroo," "Lassie," "The World of Disney") and the unspeakables ("Bozo the Clown" and "Romper Room"). The quality ranged from all right to rotten, but at least there was a commitment. In the 1970's, we have the monthly afternoon special, the seasonal rerun of a Snoopy, a Rudolph or a Grinch, crude week-end cartoons and the snakepit of "Wonderama." The networks have apparently opted for allowing public television to do it all: If children are hungry, let them eat "Sesame Street."



reruns of series like "The Brady Bunch" are "TV's home movies."

as Bugliosi in "Helter Skelter"—blacked out in home town

Notes: CBS Juggles a Hot Potato

in Los Angeles seeing "Helter wo-part "docu- t the Manson rder of the ac- Tate and six in Los Angeles of 1969, which n on the CBS coming Thurs- y at 9 P.M. The the decision of BS-owned sta- Angeles, not to ial raises signi- ns about the re- ween television and electoral for-TV film is ion of Vincent st-selling book er," in which the Angeles County strict attorney owed and successful investigation and prosecution of the band of youthful murderers whom scriptwriter J. P. Miller terms "Les Miserables with acid."

The fact that the Bugliosi character, as portrayed by actor George DiCenzo, comes across as heroic led to an intracorporate battle at CBS, for Mr. Bugliosi had filed as a candidate in the June 8 election for the post of Los Angeles County district attorney.

If "Helter Skelter" had been shown in Los Angeles before the June primary, the other candidates for district attorney could have asked for equal time. According to staff attorneys of the Federal Communications Commission, however, the equal time law does not apply to entertainment programming of this kind. The law, they explain, applies only to personal appearances by candidates (such as the episodes of "Death Valley Days" in which Ronald Reagan performs as an actor) and not to dramatizations in which a candidate is portrayed by an actor (as in "Helter Skelter").

It was at least partly in order to avoid such challenges that CBS recently decided not to buy President Ford's book about the Warren Commission's investigation of the assassination of President Kennedy. For similar reasons, the 1974 TV documentary "The Missiles of October," which presented a highly favorable picture of the handling of the Cuban missile crisis by John and Robert Kennedy, might never have been telecast if Robert Kennedy had lived to be an active candidate. An amusing exception occurred recently when KCET, the Los Angeles public television station, broadcast the BBC dramatization of the trial of the Chicago Seven in which one of the defendants was Tom Hayden, who is now opposing Senator John Tunney for the Democratic Party's nomination for the U.S. Senate. Senator Tunney might well have asked for equal time, but presumably did not feel that his position had been unduly damaged by the portrayal of his opponent as a criminal defendant.

The corporate infighting reached a high point on March 3 when CBS fired W. Russell Barry, general manager of KNXT, who had earlier flatly refused to carry "Helter Skelter" before the election. "It would not be fair to the electoral process," Barry had said. The prospect that a program which promised to win high ratings would be blacked out in the major Los Angeles market had inspired no cheer among top CBS executives. But the network was seemingly powerless to overrule Barry: both corporate and F.C.C. policies give a station manager almost unfettered power to decide what should and should not be shown in his community.

The network appeared to have only two options, neither of which was very appealing. First, CBS could have held the program until next fall, when KNXT would presumably have been delighted to air it—but such a delay would have been costly. The network has a large investment in "Helter Skelter" (a $1.5-million license fee for two broadcasts). The program's potential ratings had become especially important by the first week in March when ABC got higher ratings than CBS for the seventh consecutive week, and CBS executives wanted to end the year with a strong finish and decisive lead in the ratings. "Helter Skelter" is being counted on to make a major contribution toward achieving that goal.

The second alternative in this complex game of corporate strategy would have produced similarly discouraging economic results. The network could have allowed the program to be carried by an independent station in Los Angeles. Indeed, at least one Los Angeles station made such a request. But the show's ratings would undoubtedly suffer on an independent station, which lacks the advantages of network promotional announcements, viewer loyalty and a strong "lead-in" program. The economic consequences for KNXT (which, after all, is part of the CBS corporate earnings structure) would also be disastrous. As one KNXT executive pointed out, "For two consecutive nights whatever we put on would be murdered by 'Helter Skelter.'"

During the weeks following Barry's dismissal, it appeared that KNXT would air the program. Barry's replacement announced that he was inclined to air "Helter Skelter" and he even listed the program in KNXT's advance program log. But then early this week, considerations of political prudence finally won out over commercial temptation when KNXT's new manager announced that the show would be shown in Los Angeles — but only after the June primary.

Marshall's Turn

Some years ago, Westinghouse Broadcasting created two 90 minute talk-variety programs that became staples of television syndication: "The Mike Douglas Show" and "The Merv Griffin Show." Griffin jumped ship for CBS and now is with another syndicator; Douglas stayed on and has proved so popular that his current pay is $2-million a year.

Westinghouse hopes to score again next fall with "The Peter Marshall Show" as a 90-minute weekly series. Marshall has made his mark as one of those ever-smiling game-show hosts, but Westinghouse believes that what the viewer sees of him on "Hollywood Squares" is just the tip of the iceberg." Marshall is also a singer, actor and comedy monologist; for the past two years he has performed a successful night-club act with a singing-dancing supporting group known as The Chapter 5, under the musical direction of Alan Copeland.

Marshall's nightclub package, with guest stars, is to be the basis for the new syndicated series; it is being pitched for the 11 or 11:30 slot on Saturday nights, only because that is the time period most available at stations for a weekly show of that length.

Adaptations of Novels—Right On Or Rip-Offs?

This season's television object of most intense attention has undoubtedly been "Rich Man, Poor Man," the 12-hour dramatization of Irwin Shaw's novel. An interesting story was given a good production and a first-rate cast of several very impressive new faces surrounded by veterans doing "guest star" turns. The result, while falling somewhat short of great art, was generally far better than average television fare. And, just to complicate matters, it was extremely successful for ABC-TV in the audience ratings.

That kind of success in television inevitably breeds imitations, but it remains to be seen if the self-contained "mini-series" will become an established form. The making of "Rich Man, Poor Man" consumed a great deal of time and money. Harve Bennett, the executive producer, had been planning the project for five years. The filming required five months of shooting. The budget was in the "multimillion-dollar" bracket. Beyond these heavy costs, there is still the question of a resale market for such projects. Producers of some successful weekly series can venture "deficit financing" on the first runs of their programs, anticipating later profits in the "secondary markets." But the size of the profit is governed by the quantity of product available. A limited mini-series could not compete in a similar framework.

These are some of the economic questions ultimately to be answered in the marketplace. But what of the form itself, the curious phenomenon of TV adaptations? How faithful can, or will, TV be to the original material? Will the audience be getting a reasonably accurate reflection of some best-selling book, or will it be confronted by some mindless rip-off exploiting the familiarity of an established title? In broad outline, the television version of "Rich Man, Poor Man" did follow the master plotting of Mr. Shaw's novel. The lives of the two Jordache brothers (played by Peter Strauss and Nick Nolte) were traced from a small Hudson Valley town at the end of World War II through years of bitter separation to eventual reconciliation in the setting of a French Riviera village. In specific details, however, the TV screenplay was riddled with changes, some substantial, others so inconsequential as to seem pointless.

In the book, for instance, Tom, the rebel brother, lends Rudy $5,000, which Rudy then invests. Years later, Rudy turns over $60,000 to Tom, who is broke. In the dramatization, the initial sum is reduced to $3,000, the accumulated return to $48,000. The mysterious ways of television are infinite and awesome.

Other changes were decidedly more significant. The most notable involved the character of Julie Prescott, with the TV version (played by Susan Blakely) incorporating several of the novel's major females into a single figure. Gretchen, the sister of the two brothers, and Julie, Rudy's first love, and Jean, Rudy's alcoholic wife, were canceled as distinct personalities, their remains rolled into Julie Prescott, who retained bits and pieces of all three characters. The result was perhaps more tidy for home consumption, but it also was distorting in terms of motivation. Young Tom's crucial fire incident, for instance, was related to finding a young girl in bed with the town's wealthiest resident. In the screenplay, that girl was Julie, Rudy's girlfriend. In the novel, it was the brothers' sister. A logical motive of revenge was simply lost.

Blakely in "Rich Man . . ."—"bits and pieces of several of the novel's females"

But most of the more interesting changes, the type that lend some insight into basic TV policies, involve matters of degree. And these tended to fall into two separate categories. In the first, any legitimate opportunities for sentiment were almost invariably developed into displays of sentimentality. In the other, several instances of violence in the book were made more violent for television.

In the area of sentimentality, the death of the brothers' mother is neatly representative. The TV version had Rudy rushing to the hospital after finding the prodigal Tom. In the hospital room, Tom presented his dying mother with a scarf from Europe. She asked forgiveness for neglecting him as a child. While she gasped for breath, he embraced her with tears streaming down his cheeks. America was being comforted by the moving reunion of mother and son. But Mr. Shaw's novel was hardly that comforting. The brothers arrived at the hospital only to find that their mother was already dead. Their reactions to the news were clinical, almost objectionably cold. TV, evidently, is not about to be clinical when an opportunity for emotional manipulation presents itself.

On the violence side of the ledger, most of the examples are perhaps minor but, once again, representative. In an early confrontation scene, Tom hits his father in the face. The novel has the father barely moving from the blow and then punching Tom in return. In the TV version, the father is sent sprawling across the room, where he lands on a glass bakery display case, which is noisily shattered into a thousand fragments, leaving the father with serious cuts. The matter of degree has been escalated sharply.

In another scene, Tom is working on a ship and becomes friendly with another sailor, a black man (in the novel, he is white and somewhat effeminate). The shipboard villain, a bully named Falconetti, makes insulting comments about their friendship and, for purposes of TV, goes so far as to sodomize Tom's new friend. Interestingly, the book did not go that far; Falconetti tried, but was caught by Tom and thoroughly thrashed.

Considered singly, these changes are not especially overwhelming. However, taken cumulatively, they quite accurately reflect the mentality that governs much of the typical TV product, up to and including the news. The camera that searches for the tear on some victim of a disaster and for good "action footage" that might get a story more prominence than it deserves are simply extensions of the medium's endless exploitations of sentimentality and violence.

Sotheby's and Christie's held several major sales there (Sotheby's in Zurich and Christie's in Geneva), and many London dealers opened Swiss branches.

Much of the money rallying the art market these days is coming from new groups of buyers. At Parke Bernet's sale of the Josef Rosensaft collection earlier this month, for example, 51 percent of the buyers were American — a significant change from the early 1970's, when the dollar was weak and American dealers and collectors found themselves consistently outbid by foreigners. Irving Blum, like many other dealers, observes that the real action in art in the United States is now located outside of New York. His two "extraordinary" sales in the last month were to Midwestern collectors—a Stella painting for $110,000 (a near record) and a Lichtenstein for "in excess of" $250,000 (Blum won't give an exact figure, but claims it is a record).

In London, growing numbers of German, Belgian and Dutch dealers are filling the auction houses and pushing up prices for Venetian and other early glass, Delftware, early oak and walnut furniture, and 15th- and 16th-century paintings of the German, Flemish and Italian schools. In addition, there has been an influx of Spanish dealers in recent months; and even the French, who usually stay out of foreign markets, are on the move.

Observers of the London art market explain the keen interest of the continental Europeans as the latest wave of investment buying, despite the unhappy experiences of similarly motivated Americans, British and Japanese in recent years. But in New York, dealers report no resurgence of the speculative fever of the late 1960's, when people bought art the way they bought stocks. The days when "people were screaming 'investment, investment!' are dead," says Larry Fleischman of the Kennedy Galleries.

Despite the general sense that a recovery is underway, dealers still have reason for concern about the future. The London auction houses are uneasy about the suddenness of the upturn in sales and fear that the success of the moment could be short-lived. In addition, they are short of top quality art for sale—a shortage that began in late 1974, when prices began to tumble and collectors decided not to sell.

Many dealers in the work of good but lesser-known artists still feel that the market has not picked up enough to make their businesses profitable, and admit that they are having a quiet season. One owner of a small Madison Avenue gallery reports: "The other day a squirrel came in the window and spent a few minutes looking at the show. It was my only visitor for the day." ■

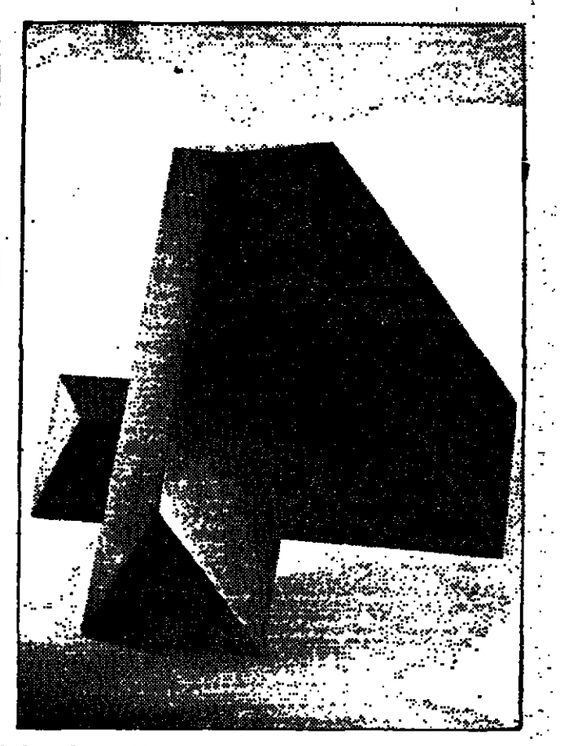
Tony Smith's "Hubris" and "Spitball"—plain statements that turn out not to be so plain after all



ART VIEW

JOHN RUSSELL

Three Shows With a Sense of Play

Much of the best art of this century is the work of late developers: men and women who felt their way around the world, and around art, before starting on the work for which they would become known. This is especially true of the American artists who came to the fore in the late 1940's, and it is conspicuously true of Tony Smith, whose sculptures are now on view at Fourcade, Droll Inc.

Tony Smith was already 52 years old when he first showed a sculpture in public. That was in 1964, at the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford, Conn.

An architect by profession (at one time he had been what he calls "clerk of the works on several Frank Lloyd Wright houses"), he had since childhood an auxiliary interest in sculpture. An experimentalist in his architecture, he was also an experimentalist in sculpture. But in none of his early experiments did he quite get through to what he once called "a reality which has not had any previous expression in art."

But sculpture wouldn't let him go. He scoured the life around him for the unbiddable something that would get him going as an original sculptor. He thought of making earthworks as long ago as the late 1950's, and he took visual cues from sources as diverse as the serpentine Indian mounds in the Southwest of this country, the half-finished airport at Newark, N. J., and the tetrahedral kites, towers and gliders designed some 70 years ago by Alexander Graham Bell.

It is also relevant that Tony Smith had a Jesuit education and knows a great deal about James Joyce. This makes him both a lucid analyst of what he himself is up to and a master of double, treble, quadruple layers of meaning. It is one of the paradoxes of his work that his apparently plain statements turn out on closer inspection to be not so plain after all.

"Spitball" in the current show is a case in point. It could have a mathematical source. It could be emblematic of an intention that curls back upon itself. It has overtones of a woman lying down with one knee raised in the air. Fact does not exclude fancy. But it is by fact above all that Tony Smith's sculptures grab us. The factual element relates to something which we have all experienced: the power of the thing done perfectly. That power can exert itself independently of our previous experience and irrespective of any known function or specific intention. It has a mysterious finality, and that finality comes out strongly in Tony Smith's structures.

They are, of course, distinctly of our own time in their preoccupation with new ideas in mathematics, new techniques in building and the use of modular components. But they also manifest from time to time an unrestrained romanticism: it is as if he had set himself, in the time that is left to him, to rebuild the Pyramids, duplicate Valhalla and drag Angkor Wat into the age of cybernetics. What is more, these visions work: I shall not forget how well a big black structure on the Champs Elysées by Tony Smith stood up to the Arc de Triomphe in Paris in 1968.

The show includes at least one model for a work of this sort: "Hubris," which was intended to be built on a monumental scale for a university campus. Even in model form there is something exhilarating about the way in which a large square, flat, patterned area would suddenly give place to a forest of 81 man-sized pyramids (through which, if all goes well, barefooted students will one day go snaking with a hop, a skip and a jump). The sense of making and the sense of play are delightfully mated in this, as in so many of Tony Smith's works.

Play has its role in Philip Guston's new paintings, too, which are on view at David McKee Inc. Guston has lost none of the sweet way with paint which was one of his contributions to Abstract Expressionism in its heyday. (For proof of that we have only to look at the one green mark which Guston uses to such seductive effect in "Pink Summer." This is a studio interior, with a table top of the kind favored by the Cubists. The table top is awash with heterogeneous objects. Where all else is pinks and reds, Guston allows one fistful of brushes just one load of green: and how it sings out!)

But this innate elegance is now offset by rude subject matter, grotesque personal allusions, and nightmare conjunctions that we would just as soon not think about (the gigantic paw, for instance, which pushes its way in from outer space in the painting called "Paw"). The theme of the gigantic head that is adrift in the studio as a result of some unexplained commotion is carried over from Guston's last show, as are the heaps of boots outworn beyond any possibility of renewal. There is something really very curious about the contrast between this landscape of desolation and the complete physical assurance of the paint. (Just how dexterously Guston can use the brush is also made clear in the small still lifes, one of which can be seen in the gallery's office.)

This trio of seniors can best be completed by David Smith, a group of whose smaller sculptures is on view at Knoedler. Like his near-namesake Tony Smith, David Smith took his time, looked this way and that, and researched himself to the point of total knowledge before embarking on the stainless steel sculptures which should not have ended his career (but happened to do so, because he was killed on the road).

The show dates mainly from the time when David Smith was casting around, wondering if there was something to European surrealism, anxious to say what he thought about public affairs but not sure how best to do it, and interested in the building of complete environments of a fanciful sort.

"The Eagle's Lair" is a good example of the way in which David Smith at that period in his career would drop the pursuit of pure formal intentions and turn aside into fantasy. Nothing stopped him if he spotted something odd or significant in Nature: whence a reference to "cheese clouds" (Gruyère, as a matter of fact) in the title of another piece. And then there is the armored "Head" from the late 1950's, initialed D. S. in Greek capital letters, to point to his interest in the manipulated object. The show works as an appendix, pointed if involuntary, to the group of David Smiths in the current "American Sculpture" anthology at the Whitney Museum.

What other country would call this unornamented Kunimure blade a National Treasure?

Japanese Swords—Craftsmanship as High Art

By JOHN CANADAY

In his introduction to the catalogue of the current exhibition at Japan House, Homma Junji, chairman of the Society for the Preservation of Japanese Art Swords, says that "it is sincerely hoped that all of those who are coming to see the exhibition will intuitively appreciate the dignity, beauty, depth, as well as the purity, of the Japanese swords on display, without caring too much about any lack of technical knowledge about the swords."

The only word that might be questioned here is "depth." Surely the dignity and purity of these beautiful steel blades, set off by an installation of corresponding dignity and purity, must impress any visitor. But their depth will be another matter for even the most intuitive Westerner. We are not conditioned to attach to craftsmanship the near-mystical reverence that separates Japanese art not only from ours, but also from even the most exquisite areas of Chinese art, including porcelains.

We do not really believe our adage that genius is one percent inspiration and 99 percent perspiration, at least not when it comes to art. If we did, we would never have had such a thing as Abstract Expressionism—all inspiration and no sweat. We think of craftsmanship in terms of skilled labor in the making of fine objects rather than in the Japanese sense of absolute control in the application of demanding technical processes in the creation of a work of fine art. For the Japanese, at least in pre-Westernized Japan, supreme craftsmanship could approach ritual.

In what other culture would the names of great swordsmiths—not the artists who designed ornamental hilts and scabbards, but the smiths who fashioned the blades—be known as far back as the 10th century, and in what other country today would the government give its highest classification, National Treasure, to an unornamented steel blade?

Japan's National Treasures are seldom let out of the country, but this exhibition includes one, the late 13th-century blade named Kunimure, "perfect in every aspect and far outstanding in quality among all the existing National Treasure blades," according to the catalogue—a loan explained by the special circumstances of the blade's recent history. Taken from the Terukuni Shrine in Kagoshima prefecture by a member of the U.S. armed forces after World War II, it was recognized and recovered 25 years later in this country by an American collector who voluntarily returned it to Japan without compensation. The collector was Dr. Walter A. Compton, an authority on Japanese swords, whose collection, including this blade of blades and four others that he has also returned to Japan, makes up the current exhibition.

At the risk of discouraging intuitive appreciation of this treasure—let me quote from the catalogue the note on its "hamon," a wave-like pattern running the length of the blade and created entirely by manipulation of the tempering process: "Hamon: Mixed type of choji and kawazuko-choji made in nioi (nioi-deki), with plenty of ashi and yo. Many tobiyaki on the mono-uchi part on the omote."

The last nine words of that note become nearly 50 when "tobi-yaki," "mono-uchi" and "omote" are defined with the help of the catalogue's glossaries: "Many rounded isolated areas of martensitic steel separated from the main hamon pattern within the area between it and that portion of the blade's central ridge line in the striking area located approximately one-fourth of the blade's length from the point on the upper side"—which is only scratching the surface of all that is involved in an in-depth technical knowledge of the swordsmith's craft.

But this, I am sure, is not the "depth" that Dr. Homma has in mind. There comes a point in acquaintance with Japanese swords when craftsmanship ceases to be a means toward the end of producing an object and becomes part of the spiritual character—the spiritual depth—of that object. These swords are not weapons, although they are sharp and strong enough to cut through bone as if it were butter. They are ceremonial and symbolical works of art, whatever their origin in weaponry.

The exhibition also includes tsubas (the guards between blade and hilt, in themselves a collectors' specialty), scabbards, and other accessories and mountings, some of them carved from (not cast in) solid gold. In their sheer gorgeousness the scabbards at first dominate the show, but only the most hurried (and least intuitive) visitors will fail to sense—we come back to the words again—the dignity and purity of the blades. With their multiple associations both temporal and religious, with their echoes of violence and their achieved serenity, they are abstractions of a Japanese spirit that Westerners may never entirely understand ever while sensing it, and which has not survived uncontaminated in 20th-century Japan itself.

The catalogue for this extraordinary exhibition would be a superb picture book even if it hadn't a word of text; but the text by Sato Kanichi, Ogawa Morihiro (Japan's leading scholar on art swords), Dr. Compton and Dr. Homma would make it the definitive manual on the craftsmanship and identification of Japanese swords if there were not a picture in it. ■

Art swords of Japan from the Walter A. Compton Collection at Japan House, 333 East 47th Street, through April 25. Open 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. Monday through Thursday; 10 A.M. to 7:30 P.M. Friday; 11 A.M. to 5 P.M. Saturday; 1 to 5 P.M. Sunday. The catalogue is $15 soft bound, $30 hard bound; there is a handling charge of $1.50 for mail orders, plus 8 percent sales tax for New York residents.

Art

"In '200 Years of American Sculpture,' a great opportunity to accomplish something definitive and necessary has been missed."

historic order into what has hitherto been a muddle and a mystery is, to be sure, a large assignment, but no larger, really, than assignments regularly undertaken in the fields of European and Oriental art. If the task seems so formidable, it is not because of its inherent size or difficulty but because we are so used to thinking small when it comes to the history of American art.

The Bicentennial promised, if nothing else, to reverse this attitude—to place the study of American art on a firmer foundation of seriousness and knowledge. Why, then, the apprehensions about "200 Years of American Sculpture"? Quite simply, because the record of the Whitney Museum does not inspire confidence in such endeavors. As the stewardship of the Whitney has passed from director to director and as the museum itself has moved from location to location, it has come more and more to look like an institution in search of a definition of itself—more and more, in other words, like part of the problem rather than part of the solution. Hence the doubts that have inevitably surrounded the most ambitious survey of American sculpture ever undertaken.

And the result? Sad to say, it is only more muddle, and muddle on a monumental scale. It would probably be an exaggeration to say that "200 Years of American Sculpture" is likely to set back the study of American sculpture for another 200 years, but it would be a very small exaggeration. For the show is badly selected, and atrociously installed. No coherent taste or standard governs its organization, and no clear perception of significant achievement has been allowed to insinuate itself into its choice of objects. It lurches from the insipid to the inspired and back again, more or less as the Whitney itself has done, bestowing its favors on the good, the bad and the indifferent with an uncritical geniality that has no place in a serious museological enterprise.

Instead of offering us a definitive account of a hitherto confused subject, it offers only a further confusion—first, by blurring all distinctions between sculpture that survives by virtue of its artistic quality and sculpture that survives, if it can be said to survive at all, because of bleak historical circumstance; and then by enshrining this mish-mash in an installation (occupying the entire museum) that places the interest of sheer visibility far below that of the designers' indulgence in a retrograde taste for drab color, for higgledy-piggledy display, and for a mode of "lighting" (it really ought to be called darkening) that can be counted on to obscure more than it reveals.

So far as the selection goes, what was required first of all was an act of intellectual courage: an emphatic acknowledgment, made manifest in the number as well as the size of the objects, that American sculpture in the 19th century yielded, at least in the realm of high art, little of enduring artistic interest. (The accomplishments of folk sculpture are something else, and it is one of the strengths of this exhibition that they are so well represented in it.) The official sculpture produced in the United States in the 19th century is, for the most part, an unrelieved tale of genteel pieties and patriotic sentiments in an unholy alliance with flaccid forms and second-rate ideas. To serve up this smorgasbord of provincial monuments and mementos as if it were a feast of artistic delicacies is an absurdity, but that, more or less, is what "200 Years of American Sculpture" succeeds in doing.

In keeping with this attitude, which amounts to a radical suspension of critical discrimination, the few artists about whose work we might have some genuine curiosity—William Rimmer, for example—are handled as if they were no better or worse than anyone else. This approach may serve a taste for camp, a taste for academic banality, or a taste for the lost ideals of civic rectitude—all of them, in the end, a taste for nostalgia—but it certainly does not serve a taste for sculptural excellence.

American sculpture in the 20th century is a far richer subject, of course, but here, too, confusions abound. To include something as trivial as Richard Tuttle's "The Fountain" while omitting all reference to Louis Comfort Tiffany makes neither esthetic nor historical sense. To include sculptors as accomplished as Gaston Lachaise, Elie Nadelman, John Storrs and John B. Flannagan, but then present them as if they were no more important than dozens of lesser talents, does not make much sense either. Indeed, the most difficult thing to discern in this exhibition is any real sense of the relative size of the achievement of the artists represented in it.

Only David Smith and Alexander Calder are allowed to show something of their true strength and variety, but then the David Smith area of the exhibition is stupidly disfigured by the presence of a huge, curved, blurry color-photo-mural of a landscape employed as a backdrop. The purpose of this large, distracting irrelevance is, I suppose, to remind us of the fact that Smith lived and worked much of the time in a bucolic setting in upstate New York, but the effect is neither authentic nor illuminating—can one imagine a similar exhibition of Picasso sculpture enclosed in a photo-mural of the south of France?—and I am reasonably certain that Smith himself would have detested it.

Certain achievements—Isamu Noguchi's for example—are all but impossible to grasp in this exhibition, while others—Nancy Graves's and Walter De Maria's—are given a prominence they do not deserve. Meanwhile, Saul Baizerman, who worked on a heroic scale, is represented by his smallest sculpture. And so it goes. Again and again, we feel the lack of a strong, governing intelligence—sometimes, the lack of any intelligence at all—and a coherent, judicious taste.

It was right, I think, to include folk sculpture in this survey, and in one case, at least, that of the "Tinsmith" figure (circa 1895), attributed to J. Krans, the show turns up a relatively unfamiliar work, only recently discovered, that is virtually certain to find a permanent place in the history of American sculpture. It was understandable, too, that the temptation to show another folk creation, James Hampton's extraordinary "Throne of the Third Heaven" (circa 1950-64)—an immense, room-size assemblage of wood, glass, metal and other found objects covered with silver foil—would be too strong to be resisted, and given an entire gallery on the first floor of the m provides the show with a real coup de théâtre. B nonetheless a distortion of history to mount an American sculpture that suggests, as "200 Ye American Sculpture" does, that James Hampton's to that history has been more important than Louise Nevelson's.

Nor has the inclusion of folk sculpture al to the role that folk art has played in the work sophisticated artists. Nadelman is the key fig relationship, but as the exhibition is organized, way for the unsuspecting visitor to grasp the c And certain other artists in this line—William K Anne Arnold—are omitted altogether. So still a of illumination is forfeited.

These are by no means the only significe in this exhibition. There is no work here by Stankiewicz or Gabriel Kohn, none by Raoul Peter Agostini or James Rosati, none—most astc by Mary Frank, whose last New York exhibiti day after day, with people who could not see e One would gladly give up some of the acreage d academic trivia of the 19th century, not to m some of the more dubious talents among the glimpse of these artists in an exhibition purp give us a comprehensive view of American s

In "200 Years of American Sculpture," a opportunity to accomplish something definitive has been missed—misunderstood, mismanage miserably presented to the public. Primary r for this debacle belongs to Tom Armstrong, the the Whitney, who served as chairman of the of distinguished and not-so-distinguished curat organized its separate parts. (As curator of the section, Mr. Armstrong did a good deal better chairman of the show as a whole.) It was I I assume, who made the fatal mistake of ass exhibition to a committee representing such standards, and then compounded it by assign installation to the architects, Robert Venturi a who, on the basis of their previous work, c counted on to sacrifice everything to the bad taste. (Anyone nostalgic for that vomi once the ubiquitous color of a thousand fu of kitchens and bathrooms of boarding hous lowly way stations in life, will be delighted tc it is used to spectacular ill-effect in this exhi installations are scarcely a rarity on the muse but this one really does take the cake.

The best thing to come out of this misc is the beautiful book that serves as its catalo at least. Mr. Armstrong had the good sense t into the hands of David Godine, the Boston renowned for the handsome books he produce Godine assigned one of his best designers—Lar to the project. Unlike the flags of most other nations, which were often designed by the country's leaders or its royal families, the design of the flag of the United States was, from the very start, in the hands of the people.

Before the Revolution the colonies had no one flag that represented all of America. Individual colonies and settlements vied with each other in making their own flags—often highly personal in design and home-made in most cases.

Many New Englanders, for example, rallied round the simply designed "Pine Tree Flag," with its lone pine tree standing on a field of white and with the solemn message "An Appeal to Heaven" printed above it. Other Americans thought the "Rattlesnake Flag," with its dangerous looking coiled serpent and the ominous phrase "Don't Tread on Me," more appropriate.

Despite the intense respect they had for their flags, Americans treated them, as one historian notes, "as a member of the family," and

Neighbors Grow Their Best Vegetables By a Dam Site

By VERN ANDERSON

When the Federal government moves in to plan flood prevention programs, the community leaders often become nervous for there is talk of dams and other retarding structures that could alter the life of the town. But in the community of Bloomfield, Conn., the story has a happy ending. The region now has a 224-acre floodwater storage basin with assorted multiple uses not the least of which is a community garden.

Tunxis Reservoir came into being in 1962 as part of the North Branch of Park River Watershed Protection Project, north of Hartford. The dam is one of four floodwater retarding structures constructed with U.S.D.A. Soil Conservation Service technical planning and financial assistance under the PL 566 Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Program.

When the dam was completed, Bloomfield signed a 50-year lease with the Connecticut Department of Environmental Protection to allow use of the floodwater storage basin behind the dam as a park. The state restricted the use of the land to things that would enhance or be indigenous to the surrounding environment.

In the early days, the 22-acre lake was stocked with largemouth bass and it soon became one of the more popular fishing sites in the area. Three hard-surface tennis courts were added. A sizable marsh gradually attracted numerous forms of wildlife and drew birdwatchers and hikers. These outdoor buffs developed two wildlife trails through the marsh and on adjacent wooded areas. More recently, the Parks and Recreation Department organized a summer day camp for children. Picnic shelters and an archery range have been added.

Most town planners would consider this multiple use of floodwater storage area adequate. But Bloomfield found still another use of the area and organized a community garden. The project was started by George Bruhns, a member of the Bloomfield Advisory Committee on the Environment (ACE). He and his wife, Eleanore, had seen a community gardening project in Mr. Bruhns's native Germany while vacationing there. Returning home, Mr.

Vern Anderson is District Conservationist for the U.S.-D.A. Soil Conservation Service.

"I don't try to oversell people on my cameras. And I won't be undersold on my prices."
Mario Hirsch

When someone comes into my store he's not gang tackled. If you want to just browse for an hour, fine with me.
If you want somebody to wait on you, that's fine, too. I'll answer any questions you have about a camera.
I'll even take it out of the box for you, unwrap the camera, put on a lens and install the batteries. Now who else does that? At Hirsch Photo I believe before you buy a camera you should work with it. I don't pressure people either.
So if it's a Canon F-1 or EF, or a FTbn, I'll help you decide which is right for you. And after all that, if you don't buy it then that's okay, too. I know someday you'll be back—because nobody else gives you that kind of service.
And nobody else gives you the kind of prices I do. Practically half my customers are professionals. They come with more cameras around their necks than I have in my store. You can't fool those guys. They know what a good deal is.
So that's it. Great service and great prices. These days it's a hard philosophy to always live up to, but I really have no complaints. And neither do my customers.

CAMERA VIEW

JANET VIERTEL

Pictures Bigger Than Life-Size

Close-up photography is a term normally used to describe photographs taken when the distance from the lens to the subject is less than a normal lens (50mm lens on a 35mm camera) can handle—usually 18 inches or less from the subject. It is an area often neglected by the amateur, in many cases because he or she is literally "turned off" by words such as macrophotography, microphotography or photomicrophotography.

Yet, from a practical point of view, all of these complex words can be ignored and the world of close-up photography can be an interesting and uncomplicated means of extending camera work for anyone. It can be done at one's leisure, indoors or out, by young or old, and permits one to be as creative as he or she wishes.

Objects take on a totally new dimension when viewed through a close-up lens, and many mundane subjects become things of startling beauty—for example, weeds, stones, shells, leaves, flowers, grains of sand, jewelry and details of the human body, to name just a few. Magnified several times through the closeup lens, a tiny insect, even a dead one, can look like a terrifying monster, and a few pebbles can evoke an astronaut's vision of the moon.

For taking close-ups, the camera can be anything from an Instamatic to a large view camera, although since the best choice for most nonprofessionals is a single lens reflex, this discussion will be limited to working with this type of camera. Either available light or artificial light can be used, but strobe, flash or even ordinary light bulbs will enhance most photos. Any film can be used but one with low graininess is desirable.

There are several ways in which a standard camera can be outfitted or equipped to take close-up photographs, but the two most popular methods are: adding supplementary close-up lenses in front of the existing lens, and replacing the existing lens with a special one designed for close-up work only.

The simplest and least expensive method is to buy supplementary close-up lenses, or a set of them (they usually come in sets of three). They can be used individually, or in combinations of two or more (for added magnification), and generally cost about $20 for the set. Instructions for use are packed with each set, but remember to always place the one with the highest number (such as "plus 3") closest to the camera's lens.

Special close-up lenses which eliminate the need for supplementary lenses are made to fit practically all of the popular single lens reflex cameras now in use. They will give much finer results than supplementary lenses, but they cost much more—from about $150 to $350 in most cases.

For taking close-up pictures outdoors without artificial light a clear, bright day is necessary. The depth of field to achieve sharpness is very small with a close-up lens—frequently only two inches or less, as compared to normal photos where the depth of field may extend several feet in front of and behind the subject — so a small f/stop which will give maximum depth of field is required (such as f/22 or f/16).

This may necessitate using very slow shutter speeds, even on a bright day, in order to permit the smallest f/stop possible. Using a high speed film will help, if it is not too grainy (in black-and-white Tri-X is fine, but in color film one with a 500 A.S.A. would be too grainy). After determining the exposure, either with a through-the-lens metering system or with a separate light meter, it is still a good idea to bracket several exposures around the one that the meter reads to allow for small variations in contrast or lighting.

Focusing must be done with extreme precision. It is often easier to move the entire camera back and forth until the object is sharply focused than it is to use the lens focus ring. After the focus is set it's essential to brace yourself and the camera as firmly as you can, then press the shutter button with a steady hand. If you tend to move, it's best to use a tripod.

When photographing an object that is easily moved by the wind — a flower or weed, for example—tie it to something nearby to stabilize it, but be sure the cord is out of view of the picture. If possible, it may be simpler to pick the flower or move the object to a more protected spot.

Although available light is simple and often adequate, pictures can frequently be improved by adding artificial light to highlight and brighten your subject (if flash cubes or bulbs are used they should be blue for outdoor lighting).

Indoor photography of close-up subjects offers a much wider range of artificial lighting possibilities and of subject selection. It is not restricted by inclement weather and can be done by many people unable to make field trips to wooded areas, or to the shores or lakes.

Indoors a tripod or clamp of some kind is essential, especially for table top setups. There are many table top camera tripods or regular tripods that will work well, and focusing is just as critical indoors as outdoors (in both cases it is usually a good idea to focus slightly in front, rather than behind your subject).

Artificial lighting is also necessary indoors, since there is rarely enough available light. With black-and-white film the simplest sort of light will do, such as ordinary light bulbs, or a miniature desk lamp. It is better to have all bulbs, including flash, bare rather than in reflectors, so either remove the reflector or paint it black. Flash bulbs and electronic flash are excellent, but photofloods produce a light that is too broad for close-up photography.

In all close-up photography, indoors or out, it is important to consider ways to make your subject stand out from its background, otherwise the picture will be confusing, without dramatic impact, and will not have the interest it should have. There are at least four ways of achieving this clarity through contrast or differentiation that one can employ—although all four will probably never be used in any one picture.

The first method is to establish a difference in tone between light and dark areas. A light object on a dark background, or a dark object on a light background, will naturally stand out well. To achieve this indoors one can use a background paper which contrasts tonally with the subject. Outdoors the problem may be more difficult, since creatures of the land and sea are very clever at camouflage. At times it may be necessary to remove a creature from its true habitat and create a realistic looking setting that has greater tonal contrast. For instance, if a greenish worm is on a green leaf you might remove him to a piece of brown or white bark.

A second method of achieving separation of the subject from its background is by using camera sharpness, i.e. throwing the background out of focus so it is only a blur, while the object is sharply focused so it stands out.

points). Some historians believe this came about for one very practical reason." Flag makers, in an attempt to save time and effort, found the molets were easier to make, and thus easier to mass-produce, than stars.

It was the molet, this so-called "Star of American Liberty," that in time became the paradigm of all modern stars used on flags.

The Flag Resolution of June 14, 1777 "resolved that the flag of the United States be 13 stripes alternate red and white, that Union be 13 stars white in a blue field representing a new constellation." But it did not define any precise arrangement for the stars. As a result, flags with circular, oval, vertical, and horizontal star designs began to appear. Probably the best-known flag of this period is the so-called Betsy-Ross pattern — a wreath of 13 stars.

Not until 1912, when President Taft approved a special board's design prescribing the exact configuration of the national flag did Americans cease adding their own personal touches to the Stars and Stripes. (The exact color tints were not standardized until 1934.)

What all this means to the flag collector is that he has a fairly good chance of finding variations of older flags. "When you think about it," says Dr. Smith, "the United States is ideally suited to flag collectors. Besides the unusually large number of different national flags, there are the still untapped numbers of state, county and city flags, each with their unique designs."

Where does one start looking for flags? One obvious place is in garages, attics or cellars of older houses, as well as in rural barns and farmhouses. Older relatives, too, may have flags that have been passed down from generation to generation, and are still in reasonably good shape.

Enthusiasts can also try flea markets, bazaars, antique stores and garage sales. Although it's unlikely that a collector will find a rare flag at a garage sale, he can frequently get such items as a Spanish-American War flag or a Centennial flag, at a good price.

Some older flags are easier to come by than others, simply because more were made during wars (the Civil War, Spanish-American War, and both World Wars) and special national events, such as the Centennial, spur the production of flags. This is especially true of the 13-star flags. Grace Rogers Cooper, author of "Thirteen-Star Flags" (Smithsonian Institution Press, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402, $3), and curator of textiles in the Smithsonian's National Museum of History and Technology says "Thirteen-star flags . . . were made over a longer period of time than any of the starry ensigns that were ever used as our national insignia. Although these flags were the official banner only from 1777 to 1795, they continued to be made throughout the 19th and 20th centuries."

However, no American flag has been produced in the volume of the 48-star flag. Enjoying the longest official reign of any Stars and Stripes—from 1912 to 1959—it is still relatively easy to come by.

The would-be collector interested in learning more about flags, or the long-time collector wanting to get in touch with other veterans, can do so through the Flag Research Center, 3 Edgehill Road, Winchester, Mass. 01890, and the North American Vexillological Association (16,500 Heather Lane, Apt. 201, Middleburgh, Ohio 44130).

Books devoted to the history of our flag, available in most local libraries, are another valuable source of information and background material. Two useful books are: "The Flag Book of the United States," by Whitney Smith (William Morrow & Co., $12.95) and "Flags of the U.S.A.," by David Eggenberger (Thomas Y. Crowell Co., $6.95).

Flag collecting is not restricted solely to national flags, however. In fact, according to Dr. Smith, "the most rewarding work may be in specialization on a particular era or type of flag."

One such area of specialization is military flags. To many Americans, these flags are the best example of unbridled national sentiment and pride. Some specialize in Civil War regimental colors, or Spanish-American War flags, or Indian war flags—to mention just a few. Those interested in learning more about military flags can write to the Company of Military Historians (287 Thayer St., Providence, R.I. 02906), a professional society of military historians and private collectors interested in the history of American arms and equipment.

Not everyone collects original flags; some people prefer the more easily available and less expensive historical replicas that can be bought from manufacturers such as the Dettra Flag Company (Oaks, Pa.) and Annin & Company (Verona, N.J.). Each has some 40 varieties of historical flags—all at fairly reasonable prices (between $15 and $30). ■

Guide to Basement Sump Pumps

By BERNARD GLADSTONE

When spring thaws, combined in many cases with heavy spring rains, causes a basement flooding problem, one of the most obvious solutions that occurs to many homeowners—particularly if the problem is a persistently recurring one—is the installation of a basement pump that will automatically pump water out as fast as it seeps in. Fortunately, a wide variety of these special-purpose pumps are readily available, either for installation in a recessed sump (a paved or lined pit in the cellar floor), or merely on top of the basement floor at what seems to be its lowest point (where water tends to puddle or accumulate).

Ideally, when a new house is constructed the builder should have studied local soil conditions and underground water pressures so that he knows whether a damp basement might be a problem. If so, he should then have installed special drain tiles (pipes) around the foundation footing to collect water, and these should be connected to a sump or pit that is lower than the basement floor so that water collects here. A pump can then be installed in this sump to carry the water safely away outside the house, and thus keep the basement dry.

However, all too often homeowners find that no such drainage system has been installed, even though every severe wet spell leaves them with water in the basement. While it is true that in some cases there are various waterproofing methods that can stop basement seepage, in many cases none of these methods will work where conditions are severe —or those methods that will work cost so much that they are out of reach for many homeowners. In such cases the obvious solution is to install a sump pump of some kind.

Drawings show how both types of pumps fit typical sump.

The typical basement sump pump installation consists of a pump that is set into a lined pit (called a sump) in the basement floor. As water seeps into this (either from the surface of the floor or from a series of drainage pipes as previously explained); an automatic switch turns the pump on when the water level inside the sump reaches a predetermined level, then turns it off again as the water level drops.

The sump or pit can be built (in those basements that do not already have them) by chopping a hole in the floor then setting either a prefabricated plastic crock (sort of a large pail) or a length of sewer pipe (called sewer tile) into the hole. The plastic liner is sealed at the bottom, but if a sewer tile is used, a floor of concrete should be poured to seal off the bottom of the pit and provide a level base for the sump pump. Regardless of the method used, the sump should be about 24 inches deep, and 15 to 18 inches in diameter.

The pumps themselves come in two basic styles or designs: the upright or pedestal type, and the submersible type. The upright type has a vertical column with a pump at its bottom, and a motor that drives the pump at the top. This type of construction keeps the motor up in the air away from the water, and enables the use of a lower cost motor.

The submersible pump has no pedestal. The motor and pump form one unit, and as its name implies, it can work under water without harm. The motor is a more expensive, oil-filled type and, since there is no vertical column, those compact units cannot be seen when placed at the bottom of a sump. They are generally more maintenance-free since there is no lubrication required and there are no shaft bearings that can cause problems. However, they do cost more than comparable uprights—anywhere from 20 to 35 per*cent more on the average.*

As mentioned above, a sump is not absolutely necessary—especially if the seepage problem is only an occasional or minor one. The pump can be merely placed on top of the floor at its lowest point, so that water will be pumped out as it accumulates. For this type of installation, a submersible will generally be preferable; it is more compact and less likely to be accidentally tipped over, and it can be easily moved from place to place as needed (if flexible discharge hoses, rather than rigid pipes are used). Also, many of the smaller submers*ibles will pump down* to a lower level of water (some uprights won't work unless there is at least 2 or 3 inches of water).

To get rid of the water the pump must be connected to pipes or hoses that will carry the water out of the basement to a storm drain in the street, or to some safe disposal point outside the house (most communities do not permit pumping this water into the regular sewer system).

Data supplied by the pump manufacturer will tell what size discharge pipe or hose is to be used, but the homeowner should make certain he selects a pump capable of handling the "head pressure" or "lift" required (this is the total of the distance the water must be lifted and then vertically pumped). The capacity in gallons per minute must also be considered, but it is a waste of money to buy a pump that is much larger than is likely to be needed (water generally does not come pouring in, it seeps in, so high capacity is not often needed).

One frequent source of trouble with sump pumps has been the float switch that activates it. Since these get only occasional use, they tend to stick, corrode, and burn the contact points—thus causing them to fail when next needed. *To com*bat this, many companies now make solid state switch controls that do not depend on mechanical contacts. One company markets a no-moving-parts switching control which senses the water level electronically to turn the pump on and off, while another company has a hermetically sealed switch with a ball that rolls in a raceway on the inside to make or break contact as the unit is tipped by rising or falling water levels. (The first type mentioned permits adjusting upper and lower limits; the second type is preset at the factory.) ■

Q: The paint on the exterior of our cinder block and concrete house on the ocean is flaking and we plan to repaint. Should we use a primer, and what kind of paint should we use? Is there a best method of application?
—J. H. K., Bronx, N. Y.

A: You should scrape off as much of the flaking paint as possible. Then I would recommend a latex masonry paint, but apply a primer first, using the one recommended by the manufacturer of the finish coat you will be applying. The method of application is not really important—either brush or roller will do. But make certain you apply the paint liberally and do not thin more than necessary.

Q: Is there a relatively easy way to replace some cracked slate on a roof? We have the replacement slates that are needed.—F. A. M., Albany, N. Y.

A: The main problem in replacing slate shingles on a roof is getting out the old nails that held the original slate in place. Roofers use a "nail puller" that consists of a flat piece of steel with a notch cut near one end. This is slid up under the slate to be removed, then the notch is hooked over the nail. The lower end of this steel bar is bent so that it folds back on itself for a couple of inches, then bends up to form a vertical lip that permits the roofer to hammer down—thus pulling the nail down and out of the way. An alternate method is to slide a hacksaw blade under the shingle, then cut the nail off. After the old nails are out of the way, the new slate can be slid in place and then nailed—but you will have to drill holes for the nails beforehand (with a carbide tipped bit) to avoid cracking.

Q: What is the best way to remove oil stains from a flagstone walk?—L. K., Bronx, N. Y.

A: One method that often works is to use one of the various "driveway cleaners" which are sold in many hardware stores. These are liquids which are designed to be scrubbed on, then flushed off with water to draw oil and grease out of porous concrete. Another trick that you can try is to spread dry Portland cement powder over the stain, then pour some paint thinner over the powder to saturate it. Cover this with sheet plastic to keep it from drying too fast, then sweep off after several hours and repeat if necessary.

Questions about home repair problems should be addressed to: Home Improvement Department, The New York Times, Times Square, New York, N. Y. 10036. Only those questions of general interest can be answered here.

NUMISMATICS

HERBERT C. BARDES

Big Weekend From Coast to Coast

The 20th annual Metropolitan New York Numismatic Convention, traditionally one of the top events on the spring show calendar in this area, opens at noon Thursday for a four-day run in the Barbizon Plaza Hotel on Central Park South. Thursday's closing hour is 9 P.M. On Friday, the show will be open from 10 A.M. to 9 P.M.; on Saturday from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M., and next Sunday (April 4) from 10 A.M. to 4 P.M. Admission is free.

The convention is sponsored by a non-profit organization of the same name, and it, in turn, is made up of 11 of the leading coin clubs in the metropolitan area. The oldest of these is the New York Numismatic Club, founded in 1908, and it is serving as the host club.

The bourse will have approximately 50 well-known dealers from all parts of the country. The exhibit area will offer more than 100 cases of competitive and noncompetitive displays; awards will be presented in the categories of U.S. coins, foreign coins, medals and tokens.

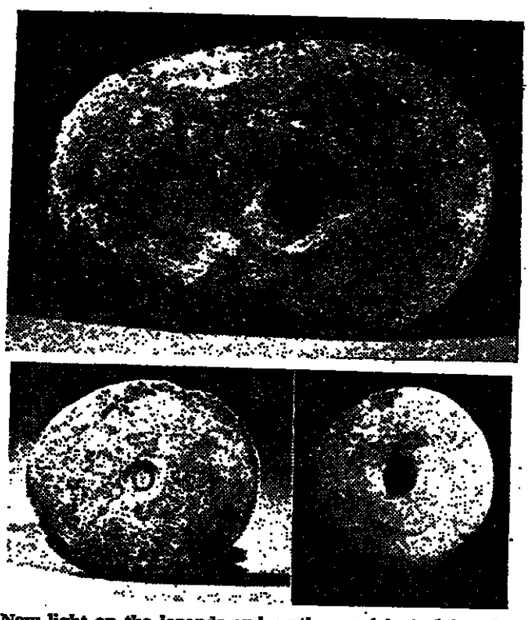
This year's convention auction will again be handled by Stack's. There will be two sessions, the first at 7 P.M. on Friday and the second at 12:30 P.M. on Saturday. The illustrated catalogue can be obtained at Stack's, 123 West 57th Street (N.Y. 10019), or requested by phone (212-582-2580). Auction lots will be available for inspection during regular business hours this week.

The Metropolitan's traditional educational forum will be held on Saturday at 4 P.M. Among the panel speakers will be Robert Medlar, president of the Society of Paper Money Collectors, and John Jay Pittman, a member of the board of governors and a former president of the American Numismatic Association.

Several special-interest groups will hold regional meetings during the convention. Included are the Liberty Seated Coin Collectors Club, which has announced its meeting for 7 P.M. Friday; the Society of Paper Money Collectors, meeting at 10 A.M. on Saturday; the International Banknote Society, at noon on Saturday, and the Metropolitan Area Token and Medal Society, at 2 P.M. on Saturday.



New light on the legends and myths—and just plain misinformation—surrounding one of the world's crudest yet most widely romanticized forms of currency is presented in "The Stone Money of Yap, A Numismatic Survey," by Cora Lee C. Gillilland, formerly of the staff of the Division of Numismatics of the Smithsonian Institution. In large magazine format, the book contains 55 pages of annotated text and 20 pages of clear photographs (from which the above illustrations were taken). The story of Yap stone money is related in ample but not excessive detail, including the earliest accounts of Southwestern Pacific voyagers some 400 years ago, the varying and often conflicting reports of native quarrying and shipping practices, investigations into the "Origin Question" and charts showing the inroads of souvenir-hunters, with current figures on the relatively few pieces of stone money left on the island. The soft-cover book is available now from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402. The price is $1.70 postpaid.

At the Same Time

Also opening on Thursday and continuing through next Sunday is the New York Coliseum Coin and Stamp Exposition, which is being held in conjunction with the 19th annual Spring Antiques Show in the New York Coliseum. Show hours are noon to 11 P.M. Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and noon to 7 P.M. Sunday. Admission is $3 for adults, $1.50 for children under 12.

Collectors on the West Coast who aren't planning to fly East for these shows have a major show of their own to look forward to. The annual convention of the Society of International Numismatists will be held Thursday through next Sunday in the Los Angeles Hilton Hotel. Jess Peters, Inc., will conduct the auction, to be held in a single session on Saturday; it features the notable Thomas Faistaner collection of Spanish-American coins.

And to round out the weekend picture for Canadian collectors, the annual Torex show will be held—Thursday through Sunday—in the Westbury Hotel in Toronto, Ontario. Frank Rose Enterprises, Ltd., of Toronto, will conduct a two-session auction (on Friday and Saturday at 7 P.M.) of more than 1,000 lots of principally Canadian coins, paper money, tokens and medals.

Jersey Dates

The Garden State Numismatic Association has capped its highly successful first year of activity by making final "time and place" arrangements for the "first annual" G.S.N.A. convention. It will be held Sept. 2-5 in the Cherry Hill Hyatt House, on Route 70, in Cherry Hill, N.J. (The mammoth American Numismatic Association convention will be held the previous week in New York.)

The G.S.N.A.'s convention chairman, John H. Harris (P.O. Box 521, Asbury Park, N.J. 07712), reports that planning is well under way for a large dealer bourse, an array of competitive and non-competitive exhibits, educational forums, an auction and a schedule of tours and social events.

An increasing number of local coin clubs throughout the state are becoming affiliated with the G.S.N.A.; in recognition of this the convention will have a special area, free of charge, in which affiliated clubs can set up tables and displays to publicize their own activities and build up their membership.

Dim Outlook for Plate Blocks Collectors

Plate block collectors, still struggling with what to do with a "block" of 50 flag stamps, may soon find themselves an endangered species and perhaps even a vanished species.

The woes that may be in store for these collectors appear to be the major development to emerge from accounts of the proceedings of the fourth national philatelic symposium that took place recently at Tempe, Ariz., under the sponsorship of the United States Postal Service. The symposium was held in conjunction with the third National Philatelic Literature Fair, the only affair of its kind held in the U. S., and put on annually by the Arizona Philatelic Research Library.

Kenneth A. DeHart, deputy director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, took the more than 200 collectors and dealers attending the symposium completely by surprise by revealing for the first time that a new webfed eight-color combination gravure and intaglio press was being installed at the bureau. With the use of the new combination press, plate numbers will "float" on the sheet selvage, in DeHart terminology, so that the same number will not appear in the same position.

According to the bureau's deputy director, there were two actual choices once the new press went into production. The plate numbers could be "floated" and collected in strips, or the plate numbers could be trimmed off the sheets. Stamps produced with the new press will have numbers in pane margins in more than 20 positions.

Collectors are being asked to write to the Office of Stamps, U. S. Postal Service, Washington, D.C. 20260 and make known how they feel about whether the plate numbers should be left on the sheets or whether they should be trimmed off before the post office panes are offered for sale at post office windows.

The new press obviously kills the notion of collectors, who, disturbed by the mounting costs of a gravure plate block of 12, for example, want plate block numbers concentrated on one corner block. Their argument, now academic but nevertheless valid, was that this would keep plate block collectors, especially the "round-the-clock" conventional four-position collectors who bought four full panes, from almost going broke with every new issue.

The new press, costing $2 million, is scheduled to be in operation within the next several months, following a test run utilizing a stamp design that would test every unit, including printing on the gummed side of sheets.

The press, actually a combined Giori-Andreotti press, will permit greater utilization of color and better reproduction of stamps with clearer impressions, along with greater latitude of design and maintaining necessary security factors.

The press was built by Koenig Bauer of Wurzburg, Germany, and includes a gravure section acquired from Andreotti of Italy. The American contractor is the Miehle-Goss Division of the North American Rockwell Corp.

The press "represents a major development in United States stamp printing, combining the full-color potential of gravure with the sharpness and clarity of recess engraving," according to Belmont Faries, stamp editor of The Washington Star-News and chairman of the Postmaster General's Citizens Stamp Advisory Committee, who was present at the two-day session. He was the first member of the group ever to attend any of the symposia.

The clearest explanation of the impact of the new press was in a recent Faries column, after his return, which said in part:

"The gravure cylinders are 23 rows of stamps around and the intaglio sleeve or cylinder has 46 rows. The two are synchronized, but a full rotation of a gravure cylinder prints two panes and three rows of stamps and the intaglio cylinder prints four panes and six rows.

"The position of a cylinder number changes with each successive pane printed on the web. If we represent the six cylinders by the digits x through 6 (with 6 as the intaglio cylinder) and blank spaces in the margin by 0, the consecutive panes would carry the numbers in this order: with the 24th pane in the same order as the first.

"Although the mechanical details are different, the results could be something like a Huck nine-color press printing. For its first stamp, the Christmas 1968 issue, collectors eventually identified more than 5,600 plate number combinations."

What will come to pass is not yet clear, but to borrow a phrase from the realm of foreign affairs, it appears clear that the winds of change are beginning to blow strongly for plate block collectors.

In the fuller explanation category, Gordon C. Morison, director of the USPS Office of Stamps and Consumer Marketing, made known hitherto undisclosed information about two experiments: the Legend of Sleepy Hollow plate number experiment and the Dove of Peace precanceled self-sticking Christmas stamp experiment. While he declined to brand either as a failure, he acknowledged that "in the sense that results obtained are the ones desired, neither experiment can be said to have been successful.

"We learned that 'all the format changes in the world would not placate irate plate block collectors, or at least not enough of them to matter,' he said. "So we dropped the project."

"The precanceled Dove of Peace Christmas stamp angered a lot of collectors who did not live in the postal districts where it was sold on a test basis," he added. "It also made a lot of letter mailers in those districts happy. These are people who found they liked not having to lick stamps. These two reactions might have made it a standoff had not two other factors been considered.

"The first was the fact that the precanceled stamps proved about as easy to remove as other issues provided the right solvent was used—and it didn't take long for somebody to discover the solvent. The second was the fact the stamps just proved to be too difficult and expensive to manufacture."

Suggestions that pictorial indicia be restored to first-day cancellations, that town names be restored in cancellations applied to first-class mail, and that a Christmas aerogram be issued were all widely favored by the collectors attending. The group was divided on whether a state theme, such as the 50 State Flag issue, be continued.

First Days

The following are the first days of issue currently scheduled in April by the United States and the United Nations, with none in the month from Canada:

BRIDGE

ALAN TRUSCOTT

Stranger Than Fiction

Adults speaking to children are careful to use simple language and make sure they are understood. Expert bridge players are not always so careful—they tend to assume that their partners are equally expert and will be able to understand their esoteric vocabulary. When this leads to disaster, as it often does, they scream loudly about their partner's technical incompetence without realizing their own inability to communicate.

This was a favorite theme of S. J. Simon, whose quartet of rubber bridge players, devised 30 years ago, Futile Willie, Mr. Smug, The Unlucky Expert and Mrs. Guggenheim, are perhaps the most famous fictional foursome in bridge literature. They seemed to have come to life on the diagramed deal, played earlier this month at New York's famous Cavendish Club.

Futile Willie as East and Mrs. Guggenheim, West, played the principal parts in the drama, with The Unlucky Expert, North, and Mr. Smug, South, in supporting roles. The opening bid by East was a typical Futile Willie effort. An eccentric weak two-bid with a five-card suit. He ran the risk of missing a good red-suit fit and did. The partnership never uncovered the five-four diamond fit in which ten tricks were available. East's dubious enterprise was motivated by the favorable vulnerability, as dubious enterprises often are.

Mr. Smug was tempted to drive to game in no-trump or hearts but contented himself with a take-out double to be followed by a heart bid. This showed a strong hand, and he relied on the Unlucky Expert to continue to game with modest values.

	NORTH ♠ 10752 ♡ 93 ◇ J6 ♣ QJ873
WEST ♠ 6 ♡ 85 ◇ A10543 ♣ A9652		EAST (D) ♠ KJ843 ♡ 10642 ◇ KQ72 ♣ —
	SOUTH ♠ AQ9 ♡ AKQJ7 ◇ 98 ♣ K104

North and South were vulnerable. The bidding:

East	South	West	North
2 ♠	Dbl.	Pass	3 ♣
Pass	3 ♡	Pass	Pass
Dbl.	Pass	Pass	Pass

West led the spade six.

He was disappointed when his partner passed three hearts and astonished to hear a double on his right.

In standard theory the player who makes a preemptive bid must pass thereafter, unless perhaps encouraged by his partner to do more. So East's final double was extraordinary, and an expert West would have had to stop and figure out what his partner was up to.

There was no exact precedent, but an analogy. For more than 40 years experienced players have used Theodore Lightner's idea: that a double of a slam contract "out of the blue" asks for an unusual lead, generally of dummy's suit. The same idea has some application at the game level, but here East decided that it should apply to a part score double. He was trying to ask West to lead a club, dummy's suit.

Not unnaturally Mrs. Guggenheim did not follow this at all. She complacently made her normal lead of the singleton, and Mr. Smug happily wrapped up an overtrick. It did not matter what East did, but he chose to duck. The nine won in the closed hand and trumps were drawn.

The club king was led and West ducked. She ducked again when the ten was continued but declarer simply overtook with the jack in dummy, knowing that this would win, and took the obvious spade finesse to take ten tricks. His only losers were two diamonds and the ace of clubs.

"Well done, partner," observed The Unlucky Expert. "I make that 930."

"I couldn't do any better, could I," quavered Mrs. Guggenheim.

"You couldn't," responded Futile Willie bitterly. "But somebody else might have. I was calling for a club lead. That would have beaten them at least 500 points, perhaps 800 points."

"Don't forget my 100 honors," pointed out South smugly. ■

CHESS

ROBERT BYRNE

Young Master

The sixth annual Louis D. Statham masters-plus tournament in Lone Pine, Calif., was notable this year for producing a great number of fighting games. With an $8,000 first prize at stakes, very few of the 56 entrants were charitable in offering or accepting draws.

One of the most uncompromising struggles ended in an upset of the United States champion, Walter Browne, by Mark Diesen, an 18-year-old master from Potomac, Md.

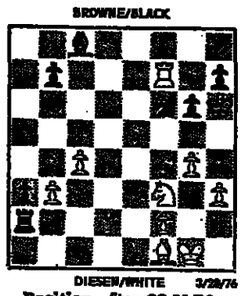
The classical King's Indian Defense that Browne used features the yielding of Black's grip in the center with 8 . . . PxP; 9 NxP so that he obtains a counterattack on the white KP by 9 . . . R-K1 and 10 . . . N-B4. Diesen's gambit, 12 Q-B2, has long been recognized as inviolable: 12 . . . KNxP; 13 NxN, BxN; 14 B-N5. Q-Q2 (14 . . . P-B3?; 15 QBxP! wins immediately for White); 15 N-B6ch, BxN; 16 BxB gives White an overwhelming bind on the position.

Diesen's 14 QR-Q1 exerted pressure on the queen file with the tactical threat 15 NxP, PxN; 16 BxN; Browne handled that by 14 . . . KN-Q2, which also prepared 16 . . . N-K4 to strike at the white QBP.

The game followed the model of Averbach-Dittmann, Dresden 1956, through White's 16th move, after which Browne improved over 16 . . . Q-N5 by playing 16 . . . N-K4. Since Diesen did not want to loosen his queenside by 17 P-N3, he had to settle for the retreat 17 B-B1.

Browne's transaction beginning with 17 . . . P-R6 and ending with 20 . . . NxKP enabled him to get rid of his weak QP in return for the KP, but nevertheless left Diesen in command of the queen file. Browne could not accept Diesen's ingenious exchange sacrifice with 23 . . . NxR, since 24 B-B3, N-N5; 25 Q-Q2, P-QB4; 26 Q-R6, P-B3; 27 BxP, Q-B2; 28 N-K5! would have carried the threat of the crushing 29 R-Q7!

BROWNE/BLACK



DIESEN/WHITE 3/28/76

Position after 38 N-B3

Diesen's sharp attack at moves 26-32 put a heavy defensive burden on Browne, yet Browne's fine sacrifice, 32 . . . Q-Q1; 33 QxP, R-K8! left the issue in doubt. Black then threatened both 34 . . . Q-Q8 and 34 . . . P-R3, hanging up the knight.

After 34 R-K3, R-R8; 35 Q-K7, Browne might have tried the wild 35 . . . Q-Q8; 36 QxPch, K-R3; 37 Q-B8ch, KxN; 38 P-R4ch, KxNP; 39 QxBch, after which it is not clear whose king is worse off. Still, his 35 . . . QxQ; 36 RxQ, RxP led to some fantastic play.

Diesen probably should have played 38 P-B4, R-R8; 39 RxN, P-R7; 40 R-B7; RxBch; 41 KxR, P-R8 Qch; 42 K-N2, which lets White's mating net force Black to take a draw by perpetual check. Instead, he played 38 N-B3?, and this could have gotten him into grave trouble had Browne played 38 . . . N-K5!; 39 B-Q3, N-N4.

But Browne, in turn, went wrong with 38 . . . R-R8?; 39 P-N5ch, K-R4; 40 PxN. There was then no resource in 40 . . . BxP; 41 RxPch, K-N5; 42 N-K5ch, K-B4; 43 RxB, RxBch; 44 KxR, P-R7, since the KBP cannot be stopped after 45 P-B7, P-R8/Qch; 46 K-N2.

Once Diesen's knight overhauled the treacherous passed pawn by 46 N-B2, Browne, a rook down, had to resign. ■

From Henri-Louis Duhamel Du Monceau's Traite des Arbres Fruitiers, as reprinted in Apples by Peter Wynne, Hawthorn Books Inc.

18th century bookplate shows apple seed, blossom and fruit

apple, completely replacing the Baldwin, a Spitzenburg derivative, on the commercial market. It came from a strain that had dawdled for two hundred years without success, the Fameuse or Snow Apple, so called from its snow white flesh. The strain goes back to France, either n seed or clone.

Sometime before 1870, it oduced a chance seedling on the McIntosh homestead in ndee County, Ontario. This seedling, the McIntosh, was destined to change apple history everywhere. It is still one of the most popular commercial apples in New York State. It has been raised all over the world, and it probably has figured in more breeding programs in experimental stations than any other apple. Why? Because it has a beautiful red skin, is an excellent eating apple, full of juice, delightful to the taste, is equally tasty when cooked, and the tree is an annual and heavy bearer.

But the McIntosh has its liabilities. Its skin is tough, and its flesh has no stability. It keeps badly even under refrigeration, and when it is cooked the flesh goes to mush, good tasting mush, but still mush.

In spite of all the breeding programs, I am not sure that any of its descendants are better than, or even equal to, the McIntosh. The Cortland keeps better, but has a duller flavor. The Macoun seems to be coming into favor, because it is good looking and good tasting, perhaps equal to its parent. The New York Experimental Station at Geneva is producing several new ones that bear watching.

There are among the all-purpose apples many other good older varieties, that are worth trying: the Baldwin, so popular for fifty years, Hubbardston, Swaar, Winesap, Grimes Golden, Wealthy and Yellow Bellflower. None of them are in the top rank with the Spy, unless it is Yellow Bellflower. All are difficult to find except in local nurseries in regions where they are still popular, or in specialized apple nurseries.

For apples of more limited use, top prize must go to the Rhode Island Greening, which has the longest history of any American variety, going back to the 1700's in Rhode Island. Eaten raw it is only mediocre, but cooked it has a flavor that no other apple can duplicate, a mellow richness, less tart than a Spy or Spitzenburg, but as delightful.

Two groups of specialized apples are the harvest apples and the sweet apples. The harvest apples ripen early in summer, from the first of July through August. The prize is the Red Astrachan, originally from Russia. It is a bright red medium sized apple, ripening toward the end of July. It is too tart for eating raw, but of all apples for cooking I put it at the head of the list. It makes the best apple pie, the best applesauce, and the best jelly. If the applesauce and jelly are made by cooking with the skin on and then straining, the red color comes through as a good pink.

Applesauce made from Red Astrachans and canned by open kettle method will keep its flavor a year. The fresh fruit does not keep at all, and the tree is a biennial bearer but there seem to be two strains bearing fruit on alternate years, so that with one of each it is possible to have a crop each year.

Another much loved old apple, the Gravenstein, was probably a sibling of the Red Astrachan. The fruit is quite similar, but it ripens a month later, in September.

The Yellow Transparent, another Russian apple, ripens earliest, about the first of July. The fruit is small to medium sized, is fairly good eaten raw, and makes excellent pies and applesauce. Its liability is a tendency to go mushy quickly, so that one has to catch the fruit at just the right stage of ripeness. The tree is a good annual bearer.

The Sweet Bough is an old variety that straddles the harvest and sweet groups. It is most valuable as an early season apple that is delicious eaten raw, provided one likes sweet apples. The more common of the sweet apple group are the Pound Sweet, an enormous yellow green apple, ripening in September, and the Tolman Sweet, a smaller yellow apple. Both are delicious eaten raw, but they have none of the tartness necessary to a good cooking apple.

Two apples that have become most popular on the commercial market, the Delicious and the Golden Delicious, verge toward the sweet apple group. Both have attained their prominence largely by their ability to keep well on supermarket shelves and by their ability to grow and ripen well over a large geographical area. Many of our best northeastern apples do poorly in warmer climates. Both the Delicious and the Golden Delicious have extended their range on this continent into the tropics as far as Mexico. The Golden Delicious, which genetically has no relation to the Delicious, is at its best a good apple for eating raw. The Delicious even at its best is only mediocre. It has triumphed because of its bright red color, its almost perfect keeping ability, and its particular adaptability to the climate of Washington and Oregon.

Genetically Golden Delicious is an unstable strain. Originally a striped red and yellow apple, it has developed dark red spots more attractive for the market. It is so unstable that the State of Washington has now recorded some one hundred and twenty-five strains, with evaluations. By northeast standards, neither the Delicious nor the Golden Delicious is worth much for cooking. Again the Golden Delicious is the better, but it must be reinforced by lemon juice to make a good apple pie.

Very popular in the nursery trade now are the Five-on-One Dwarf trees. Apples are easy to graft, by stem graft in early spring and by bud graft in midsummer, so it is simple enough to have a young tree with five branches bearing different varieties. The trouble of most of those in the trade is that the varieties grafted are rarely excellent varieties.

For those limited to a small space, the best answer is to learn to graft, buy one dwarf tree, and graft upon it the other varieties desired.

What about the newer varieties, many of which are now coming out of experimental stations around the world? I'm not sure that any of them are yet in the class of the Northern Spy, but they are free from some of the Spy's liabilities, and often have an individuality worth trying. From Geneva has come Jonamac, a cross between Jonathan and McIntosh, with some of the good qualities of both parents. Another, Jonagold, is a cross between Jonathan and Golden Delicious, a large winter apple, light scarlet over a yellow ground skin. Perhaps most promising of all is Spigold, a cross between Northern Spy and Golden Delicious.

None of these perhaps taste any better than either of their two parents, but they are all good apples. If one wants to go farther afield, there are the foreign apples. From Europe there is Cox's Orange, an all-purpose apple that has held its own over a hundred years and given rise to many seedlings both there and in Australia and New Zealand.

From Japan there is Mutsu, a large green winter apple improving with taste as winter storage goes on. And from Australia there is Granny Smith, also over a hundred years old, another large green winter apple that has been planted as far north as Scotland, and is now being sold sometimes in the late spring off-apple season in California.

Sources for some of the rarer varieties of apples are: Baum's Nursery, New Fairfield, Conn. 06810, Kelly Brothers, Dansville, N.Y. 14437; Miller Nurseries, Inc., Canandaigua, N. Y. 14424; Henry Leuthardt, East Moriches, N.Y. 11955; New York State Fruit Testing Cooperative Association, Geneva, N.Y. 14456. Scion wood for grafting is available from the Worcester County Horticultural Society, 30 Elm Street, Worcester, Mass. 01608.

Bruhns suggested a similar gardening project in the Tunxis Reservoir floodwater storage area. The committee agreed with the idea and so did the Bloomfield Parks and Recreation Department.

The pilot garden emerged in the spring of 1974 from a grass and weedladen field into a half-acre of 50 fertilized and tilled twenty foot by twenty foot plots. They were assigned to interested families on a first come basis.

With the success of the 1974 garden, combined with increased food prices and a "back-to-the-land" attitude, the community garden activity for 1975 mushroomed. Demand for plots grew to two and a half acres, five times that of the previous year. The 180 twenty foot by thirty foot plots were assigned with a fee of $2 per plot to defray expenses.

Several loads of cow manure were donated to the project by the A. C. Peterson Farms, one of the many co-operators with the Hartford County Soil and Water Conservation District. Leaves from town properties were dumped at the site to help enrich the soil and to save the town a longer trip to their land-fill area. The manure, leaves, castor pomace (for nitrogen) and six tons of granite dust (for potassium) were hauled and spread by town employees with town equipment. All this material helped correct soil deficiencies noted by the Connecticut Agricultural Station soils analysis.

Last fall, soil tests showed nitrogen to be the only deficient plant nutrient. This season an ample amount of the nutrient will be added to the fertilizer program to assure an adequate balance of all the nutrients to stimulate a successful growing season.

Last season, as part of community interest and involvement, a volunteer plowed the land using his own equipment. A sawmill donated stakes and a Saturday morning volunteer working party divided the garden into plots.

Anxious to see the project continue, Bloomfield's Town Manager, Clifford Vermilya, suggested that the Community Garden Club project become a town sponsored but financially independent club. Club officers were elected in July, by-laws were adopted and assessments were set for this year's garden. Section leaders, overseers of 45 plots each, were chosen and a mail-in plot renewal system developed.

This year, at the March meeting, officers for the season were elected. This is also the deadline for last year's participants. March was set as the deadline to renew garden plots. After this date new gardeners will have an opportunity to sign up for a plot. There will be 200 20 by 30-foot plots and they are signed up very quickly. Because the water table is high such crops as corn, tomatoes and eggplant have done very well.

"Results of the gardening prove the growing community interest in our 'do-it-yourself' effort," says Parks and Recreation Director Harold Barenz. "Very few people abandoned their gardens during the summer, and then usually for a good reason. And when they did, someone nearby took the plot. Hauling gardening tools across town didn't seem to discourage anyone. They kept coming even in the hottest weather. Most families grew enough fresh vegetables to keep their families supplied all summer. Others canned or froze vegetables for the first time. One ambitious boy even raised an extra supply of vegetables to sell so he could have extra spending money."

Jim Tomasek, the Community Garden Club's first elected director, is very enthusiastic about the success of the project. A bountiful harvest for many families is only part of the benefits for Bloomfield, according to Director Tomasek. New friendships, a chance to work for the community, a greater appreciation of our natural resources and the gratifying results of people working together, may be even more important.

One thing is certain. The folks in Bloomfield have found one small way to make life a bit more pleasant while many communities are facing disturbing urban problems.

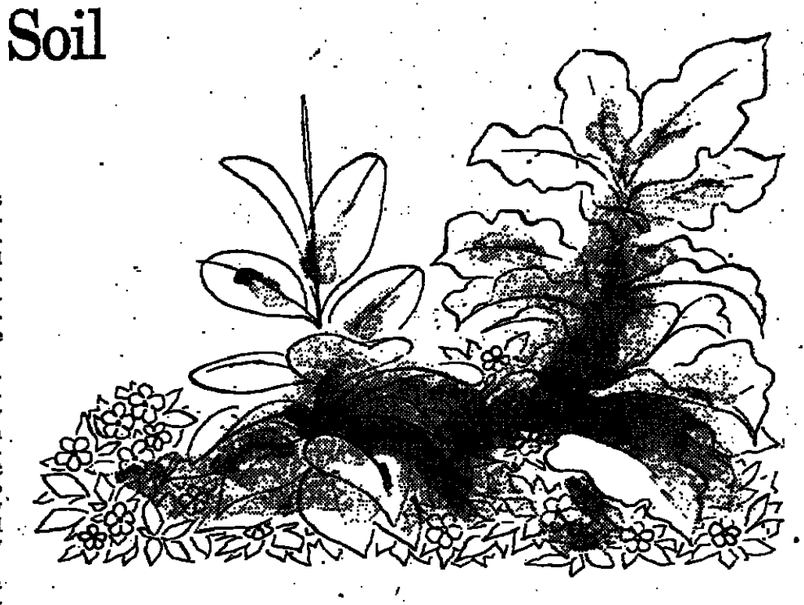
A Connecticut Enthusiast Tells Why it is So Important to Select the RIGHT Potting Soil for Your House Plants



Twenty years ago, when I first became interested in growing plants in my home, I used to refer to the soil as "dirt". I thought that if I could approximate the natural environment of a tropical plant by giving it warmth, water, light and dirt, then it would thrive.

I couldn't have been more mistaken, particularly as far as the "dirt" was concerned, for many years later I was to discover that the "dirt" (or the "soil", as I now respectfully term it) performs functions other than just supplying nutrients and moisture to be taken up by the roots.

The specific situation that led me to this conclusion was that I could not grow impatiens in my home during the winter months in the very same soil that they flourished so well in outdoors during the summer. Surely, I reasoned, a plant that flowers profusely in the shade outdoors, would easily adapt to growing in the shade of the indoors, with similar temperature and the very same soil. But I was wrong.

It wasn't until I realized that conditions in the home are far more hostile to plants than we all think and that being incarcerated in pots and containers might well make a difference, that I turned to the soil as the probable culprit. Our homes are also a far cry from the controlled environment of a greenhouse that is designed to duplicate, as nearly as possible, the great outdoors of a warm, constantly humid climate that most tropical plants thrive in. In our homes there's very little humidity during the cold winter months – the very time we all want to see our house plants flourishing at their colorful best – and the effects of misting generally only last about half an hour at the most.

Many tropical plants have the ability to adapt to less sunlight than they would normally require but they are real sticklers when it comes to soil and moisture requirements, showing little inclination to adapt to too much or too little water, inadequate humidity and excessive or insufficient nutrition. Excessive water retained by the soil will starve roots of vital oxygen, often causing the plant to die. Soil that allows water to drain through it rather quickly very soon dries out, becomes "caked", and the plant suffers from lack of moisture available to the roots and lack of moisture normally given off into the air – vital humidity!

As an example of this, imagine a hot tropical sun beating down on the leaves of a plant that has not received any rain for several days. Much of the vital moisture and humidity wafting around the leaves preventing them from being "dried out" is coming from a soil that is to a great extent composed of decayed vegetation, which retains sufficient moisture and at the same time allows excess water to pass through so that the roots are not sitting in a constant pool of water.

To retain the humidity given off by the soil to give seeds and cuttings started indoors a fighting chance, many people cover them with plastic bags. But covering all our plants this way is not practical – and certainly unsightly.

The structure of the soil is therefore of vital importance for growing healthy plants indoors. Outdoors the situation is much less critical because there's so much more soil surrounding the plant to retain moisture and waft up humidity around the stems, leaves and flowers, that it is so finicky about. The right soil enables plants to gain a real foothold in a dry, hostile environment by actually creating a miniature "greenhouse-like" atmosphere around the plant!

After several years of mixing my own soils and experimenting with commercially packaged soils, I came upon the NEW ERA brand of potting soils and mixes that proved to be the solution to my problems. Impatiens now bloom year round and all other plants are remarkably healthy as well.

I found out that New Era potting soils and mixes are deliberately and precisely blended with all this knowledge and all these considerations in mind. They have been developed over the years to be consistently superior soils specifically for plants grown in containers in homes, by people who have been growing plants for well over fifty years. (I should have discovered New Era twenty years ago and saved myself a lot of heartaches!)

NEW ERA soils actually contain a large amount of pasteurized, decayed vegetation that is so vital for moisture retention and for providing humidity – let alone a wealth of organic nutrients. They are also balanced as far as the pH factor (acidity) is concerned, and are fortified with the right amount of nutrients with the full knowledge that house plants are going to be growing in the confines of a pot or container and in the unnatural environment of a home – not in a greenhouse, for there's a big difference!

There's also a whole line of excellent plant foods, carefully formulated to work together with the New Era Soils.

You'll find you can buy a whole range of New Era plant foods, potting soils and plant mixes, including special blends for African violets, cacti, philodendrons, terrariums and so on – together with special starting mixes for seeds and cuttings – at most supermarkets and variety stores, and at a whole host of garden supply centers and stores throughout the Northeast.

ALAN SLATTER

Alan Slatter lives in Southern Connecticut and has some 200 plants growing in his home, many of them six and seven feet in height. A double pink flowering impatiens is no less than 3½ feet tall and 4 feet across! Each plant has to be carefully placed because of less than desirable sunlight conditions. The living room is a veritable jungle with masses of color from flowering impatiens, azaleas, hibiscus, canna and African violets. Sturdy impatiens plants even bloom in a cold Northern exposure that receives no direct sunlight at all during the winter months!

Film Investments Earn Tax Breaks —And Criticism

treated like any other business in-." Mr. Sharmat said. "I won't let a script or intrude on the set, or introduce them to the cast. And I'm not a pimp."

These tax shelters, which also are credited with spurring movie production, are under strong attack from Congressional tax reformers, but even they haven't been able to calculate exactly how big the loophole is.

"We're trying to find out, but at this point, we just don't know," said a Congressional staff specialist on movie tax shelters. But there appears no doubt that the amount of income on which taxes are deferred runs high into the millions. The movie shelters could even be killed this spring by the Congress, but a coalition of movie industry interests is mobilized in an effort to change rather than end the tax break system.

Last fall the House of Representatives voted to end most of the benefits for outside investors in films. The Senate adjourned before it could act on the same legislation, but it opened hearings last week on the proposed changes. Traditional Rivals: the major studios, independent producers, film labor unions and exhibitors are pressing a well-scenarioed effort in Washington to block reform. But even among the major studios there's a split: some want the tax shelter law kept; others actually want the loopholes closed.

Leading the fight to retain the tax shelter in Columbia Pictures Industries Inc. which probably kept itself in business in recent years by tapping such outside money after other sources dried up because of its huge debt of more than $100 million.

Last month, Columbia persuaded other members of the Motion Picture Association of America—the major studios' trade group—to join its fight to keep the shelter, albeit with some changes to limit abuses.

But even though they supported the action, at least two major producers that don't need outside financing—MCA Inc. and the Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation are quietly encouraging efforts to end the tax break used by some of their competitors.

Individuals' investments in films range from $10,000 to more than $1 million although most are $100,000 to $200,000. High tax bracket investors benefit from film investments under two different approaches:

In one, called an "amortization purchase," an individual or group buys a completed movie generally paying no more than 25 percent of the price as down payment, and sometimes as little as 5 or 10 percent. Despite the small down payment, the investors are entitled to deduct depreciation for the film based on its full price. They can apply this depreciation to offset their income from other sources. And they benefit, too, from a share of the 10 percent Federal investment tax credit.

In the second category, a limited partnership syndicate forms a so-called "production service company" ostensibly to produce and finance a film. Generally, such investors advance only 25 percent of the production costs in cash and borrow the rest from a bank as a non-recourse loan—that is, the debt is charged against box office receipts and the bank does not have recourse against the individual investors.

Though the investors put up only 25 percent of production costs, they can deduct a pro-rated share of the full production costs on the film during the year in which they invested because cash accounting methods are used.

Thus by investing $100,000, a wealthy man may obtain a deduction of $400,000 from his current income, a valuable offset. For a per-

Grain Surpluses Are Building Again

By H. J. MAIDENBERG

But Control Of Stocks Has Shifted To Farmers

Four years ago, the Soviet Union precipitated a revolution in America's biggest industry—agriculture—by buying up 700 million bushels of United States grain.

Practically overnight, Washington was relieved of its costly farm surpluses and could more or less gracefully back away from being a major supplier of free food to the world's poor and hungry nations.

As food prices soared following the Russian purchases, Government farm subsidy programs became academic; the "soil bank" that paid farmers to keep acreage idle, closed its doors. For the first time since the New Deal days, Washington was 'out of the grain business.

Consumers, who had complained about the cost of farm surpluses and the money-for-unworked-land program, turned to blaming farmers, the Soviet Union, the big grain exporting houses and the food industry for the high prices at the supermarket.

Today, the stockpiles of basic foodstuffs are mounting once again, the poor countries are increasing the pressure on Washington to supply cheap food and the consumer is looking for price relief.

But it is now the farmer—not Washington—that holds the surplus wheat, corn and soybeans. And the farmer, faced with rising costs and falling prices, is not about to donate his produce to anyone, at home or abroad.

Price figures are hard to come by, but farm experts estimate that anywhere between 45 and 60 percent of last year's bumper crops of wheat, corn and soybeans are still held by growers.

"We've never seen such discipline and unity of purpose among farmers as we are witnessing today," observed Roderick Turnbull, an official of the Kansas City Board of Trade, in a telephone interview last week.

"It isn't a boycott of the market; just careful selling, only when the farmer thinks the price is right. Of course, the knowledge that supplies are there has kept prices from being 'right' for months."

For a farmer, of course, the right price means covering land costs, taxes, investment in buildings and machinery, ratios of fertilizers to output, assorted other expenses and profit goals. For those buying, the right price is naturally the lowest available, and in times of surplus the two sides play a waiting game.

The reason farmers don't want to sell into this market is that prices are already down.

The July delivery on the Chicago Board of Trade, for example, had ordinary wheat at $3.59 a bushel last Friday, compared with $3.61 a year ago. The same corn delivery was $2.72, down from $2.94, and soybeans fetched $4.81, compared with $5.97 on the like 1975 date.

Morton I. Sosland, publisher and editor of Milling & Baking News, Kansas City, also citing "rare discipline" of farmers, added that "we thought farmers were waiting for the new tax year to start before selling."

The selling has not shown up, he explained, because "not only are most farmers economically fat, but they are also still bitter over what they rightfully consider was ts Take On a Vested Interest

By LEONARD SLOANE

Zeke Rose, a partner in a small business in New York, is in his early 40's. Earlier this year, he bought the first suit he has ever owned that came with a vest. It was strictly by chance.

"I was looking for a blue suit and the one I liked happened to have a vest with it," he said.

Jonathan Rogers, a 24-year-old theater administrator in Baltimore, Md., also has bought a vested suit. But he has been wearing vests for the last seven years and knew exactly what he wanted.

"It makes me look thinner," he explained. "I occasionally wear it instead of a coat on mild days."

The purchases by Mr. Rose and Mr. Rogers are being echoed by the millions these days as American males discover—and rediscover—the vest. It's all because the men's clothing industry is finding what it needed most. After one of the worst years in its history it has come up with a powerful selling idea.

The latest "new look" is not only stimulating sales because of stylishness: it is also using up more material and thus swelling everyone's business from fabric makers to suit retailers. It takes about 15 percent more material to make a suit a three-piecer.

The vest has been around for hundreds of years in one manifestation or another. Men of the court of Charles II of England wore it three centuries ago, and called it the waistcoat, which they pronounced "weskit."

It crossed the Atlantic along with the English colonists and later became a traditional third part of the American suit—until World War II when fabric scarcity put vests out of style.

Certain public figures, John Foster Dulles among them, were later identified with the product, but vests never returned to their pre-war popularity.

The recent surge in vest volume was sparked by young men who wanted a new sartorial fashion, and by the stores and manufacturers that supply this "contemporary" market.

In women's wear, a single designer can start a trend, but men's styles typically depend on many companies moving in the same general

Business Builds Its Political War Chest—Legally

By MICHAEL C. JENSEN

What began as a slow but steady stream of corporate "political action committees"—formed last year following a landmark ruling by the Federal Election Commission—is turning into a torrent.

American business and professional groups, already sitting on top of a $9 million political war chest, are rushing to form new committees which aim to raise additional millions of dollars for this year's Presidential and Congressional candidates.

At least 100 new corporate committees were registered with the election commission in the first 10 weeks of 1976, virtually equaling the number of such committees established during all of 1975.

In one record-breaking week this month, 17 new corporate plans were filed. The sponsors included the General Telephone Company of the Southwest, the Idaho Bank & Trust Company, Heublein Inc., Bendix Corporation, Koppers Company Inc. and Anheuser-Busch Inc.

Cash on hand in the treasuries of political action committees on Dec. 31, 1975, included $3 million from corporations, $2.7 million from the agriculture and dairy industries, and $2.5 million from the health field, largely the American Medical Association and the American Dental Association.

100 New Committees Established This Year

While the money already accumulated is considered substantial, some experts say the flow of cash is just beginning.

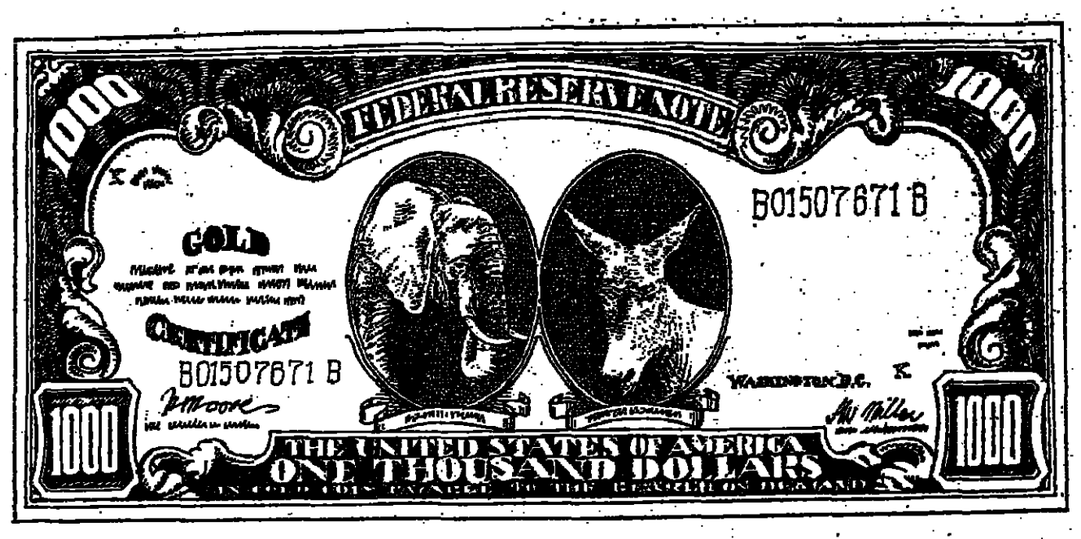
"It's a mind boggler," said Fred Wertheimer, vice president of Common Cause, which considers itself a citizens' lobby headquartered in Washington. "We're facing potential corporate explosion in the campaign financing world. We don't know when it's going to come, but with the committees that have been created just in the past year, it's surely coming."

Despite uncertainties that arose last Monday when the Federal Election Commission lost most of its authority, at least temporarily, in the aftermath of a Supreme Court decision, corporations may still legally operate political action committees.

Some of their activities, such as soliciting contributions from hourly employees and establishing more than one committee per company could ultimately be outlawed by Congress. The contributions to a single candidate allowable at present is multiplied by the number committees a business sets up.

However, many companies already have voluntarily confined their solicitations to the executive suite, and have established only a single committee, so they would not be adversely affected even if Congress decided to impose stiffer restrictions in the weeks ahead.

Meantime, money is still being gathered and the creation of new committees, which began to accelerate last year, continues unabated. Typical of the surge in committee formation in 1975, according to Common Cause, was the registration of committees by 17 of the nation's oil companies, including the Atlantic Richfield Company, the Cities Service Company, Standard Oil Company (California), Standard Oil Company (Ohio), the Sun Oil Company and Texaco Inc. Before the 1974 elections, only one oil company, Union Oil of California, had registered a political committee.



Even though gifts from these committees to candidates have been relatively modest so far, some company committees have amassed substantial treasuries.

By the beginning of 1976, the latest required reporting date, the largest on record was the Northwestern Officers Trust Account, sponsored by the Chicago & Northwestern Transportation Company. It had accumulated $180,252.

The General Telephone Employees Good Government Club, sponsored by the California Telephone Company, had collected $64,565. The Pacific Lighting Political Assistance Committee, sponsored by the Pacific Lighting Corp., had collected $45,073.

The big money, however, was being amassed by trade associations. The National Association of Realtors, for example, collected $192,000. The Association of General Contractors had $91,000; the medical profession $85,000; underwriters $122,000; bottling and truck dealers $316,000, and the national $316,000.

The nation's labor unions, of course, also are busy collecting money for their members. Arthur Morgan, labor reporter, says $1 million gathered for political purposes.

Specific interests gathered into political groupings by Common Cause had particularly large accumulations. By January 1976, Associated Milk Producers Inc. had collected $1 million, the American Medical Association and its affiliates had $1.6 million, the maritime unions $1 million.

Although corporate political action committees have been legal for 30 years, their activities have been severely proscribed, and—as a result—spectacularly restrictive. A number of large companies have simply passed their funds legally and surreptitiously to politicians.

Today, the limits governing corporate political activity allows companies to pay the expenses of political action committees and to decide what kinds of the collected funds companies are still prohibited from giving corporate funds to candidates, however.

The new law, enacted after massive public disclosure of illegal corporate contributions, has caused many companies to turn their political action committees into what it is widely considered to be a method of buying political influence.

Company-sponsored committees are allowed to distribute up to $5,000 to each federal candidate but by circumventing conventions, companies can give more than $5,000 each. Companies that have more than one committee—Chemical Company, for example—the permissible amount is multiplied accordingly.

A company's ability to is further enhanced by the fact that its committees can receive unlimited amounts from executive committees, stockholders maintained by employees that serve the company's industry.

Auto Dealer's Fund Will Sort Friends From Enemies

By ROBERT J. FENDELL

The day is "not too terribly far off," says Ed Mullane, a Ford dealer from Bergenfield, N.J., "when we'll start rewarding our political friends—and taking care of the worst of the rest."

Mr. Mullane, thanks to the new federal law on political financing, has scurried around the country raising the money that might enable him and other car dealers to carry out that promise—and that threat. Just last week, he said, he picked up $80,000 for political action at a meeting of just 300 dealers in Ohio. Earlier this year 1,700 dealers and auto company officials paid $150 a plate at a dinner fund-raiser in Las Vegas.

Mr. Mullane is one of five trustees of the Dealer Election Action Committee which aims to raise $2.4 million for this year's political campaign. D.E.A.C. exemplifies the potential influence the law gives—not just to big companies, but to smaller businessmen, too, like the automobile dealers.

If a Congressman votes against auto dealer interests, says Sam White, an Oldsmobile dealer from Houston, D.E.A.C. might just send a television commercial into his district during the campaign intimating, for example, that the Congressman helped add $1,300 to the price of a car.

There are 24,000 car dealers in the nation. "We have 24,000 unpaid lobbyists all over the country in every legislator's home district and we have a computer in Washington, D.C., recording every vote he makes pertaining to the automobile," said Bill Hancock, a Buick-Opel dealer in Columbia, S.C., chairman of the new political action committee.

"We couldn't have wanted a better law if we had written it ourselves," said H.L. Galles Jr., an Albuquerque, N. M., Chevrolet dealer. The four dealers-trustees of D.E.A.C. will make the major decisions on the group's political spending. The fifth trustee will be the president—who changes yearly—of the major car dealer trade organization, the National Automobile Dealers Association.

The articles of association for the Automobile and Truck Dealers Election Action Committee, the group's formal name, say its purposes are "the protection, preservation and furtherance of the interests of the motor vehicle user and the protection and advancement of the automobile and truck retail industry." The articles also declare the group will "make contributions and expenditures with the attempt to influence the selection, nomination or election of any individual to any Federal office including, without limitation, contributions by the committee to national, state and local committees of national political parties."

The political committee has 10 regional committeemen plus a chairman for truck dealers coordinating state chairmen for most of the 50 states. Each state receives 20 percent of the contributions made by its own dealers if there is an eligible local political committee.

In addition, D.E.A.C. plans to bring local dealers into Washington to discuss automobile questions.

"If they know a Congressman personally, we want them to help us be helpful to him by educating him on the implications of any legislation affecting the consumer and us," said Mr. White, the Olds dealer from Houston. "We want to get these views across in committee, not when it's almost too late on the floor of Congress."

And he says, "but if there's a mistake being made and we see it being made, we're going to publicize it regardless of whether it's a Congressman or a government agency."

The interests of dealers are not always synonymous with those of the car makers, and they're not always synonymous with those of the consumer or environmentalist—although the dealers' interests may coincide with any of these other groups at times.

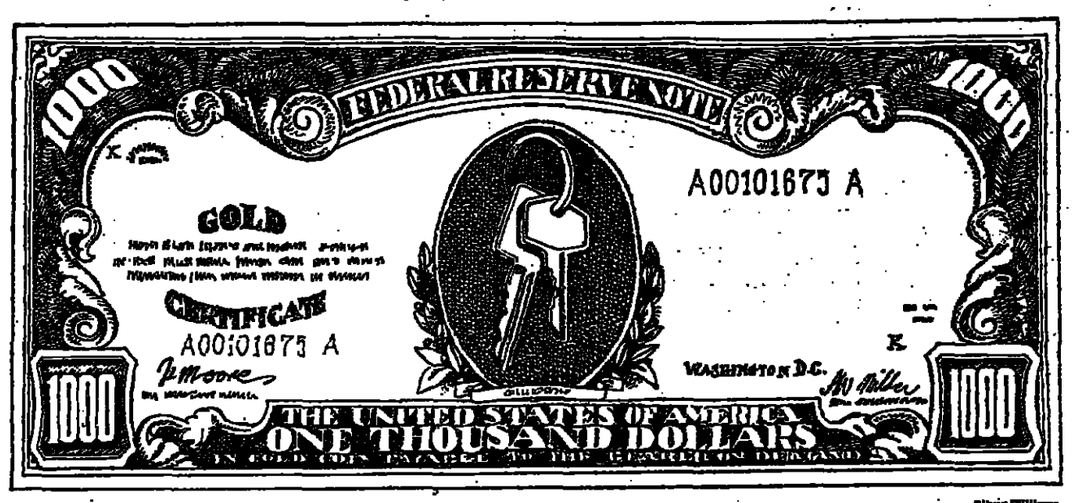
For example, the leaders of the group say they are for environmental controls and safe cars—and they are also against government rules that would increase the cost of cars and hurt their sales. Mr. White says, and the other dealer leaders agree, that a key goal is organized dealer power to block "people and legislation and rulings that we all know have cost the motoring public a lot with little benefit."

They are particularly interested in laws involving franchising agreements, which means they are interested in giving the franchise holder more power and the franchise giver less.

The car dealers also figure the car makers haven't been too successful in their lobbying efforts in Washington. "The manufacturers are helpless and hopeless in Washington," said Mr. Hancock, the Buick dealer from Columbia. "They can't tell the truth there, haven't in 20 years and nobody expects them to start. That leaves the car dealer naked and unrepresented particularly in Congress.

"We are not going to let them (car manufacturers) put one dime into this organization as manufacturers and we will oppose them when their interests are different" from ours, he said.

"Our government is geared to respond to pressure," said Mr. Mullane. "It's as bad for an industry such as ours—when we stop, the whole system comes to a screeching halt—not to press for its ends as for a private citizen not to vote for his candidate."



Oliver Williams

"When you've got a Southern Democrat, a Northern liberal, and, for all I know, two Republicans making our decisions, you know they're not going to be on party lines but on what our customers show us is good for the industry," he said.

Mr. Mullane of New Jersey, thinking grandly, sees his fledgling organization as part of an even bigger, although loose, coalition of small businessmen and franchisees, "425,000 entrepreneurs typifying raw democracy in action, reestablishing the viability of the small businessman and true free enterprise, not freedom only for the big corporations to increase their profits," he said.

...tion and it is liable to the funds for certainly more than $2 billion because of past underfunding. Additionally the city will be indebted to the funds for at least $4.1 billion more.

"Incredible," declares another member of the Congressional pension task force.

As cities and states have found it an increasing struggle to meet current pension costs, public employees have become frightened that there may not be enough money to pay all the benefits promised. The employees, and their unions, therefore have gone to court in Illinois, Detroit, Philadelphia and other states and cities to force state and local governments to begin meeting unfunded liabilities.

While New York State pension funds also have been obligated to the rescue of the city and of state agencies, no other major city or state so far has fallen back on its own pension funds to avoid bankruptcy. Many cities and states, however, for years also have underfunded pension costs by billions of dollars.

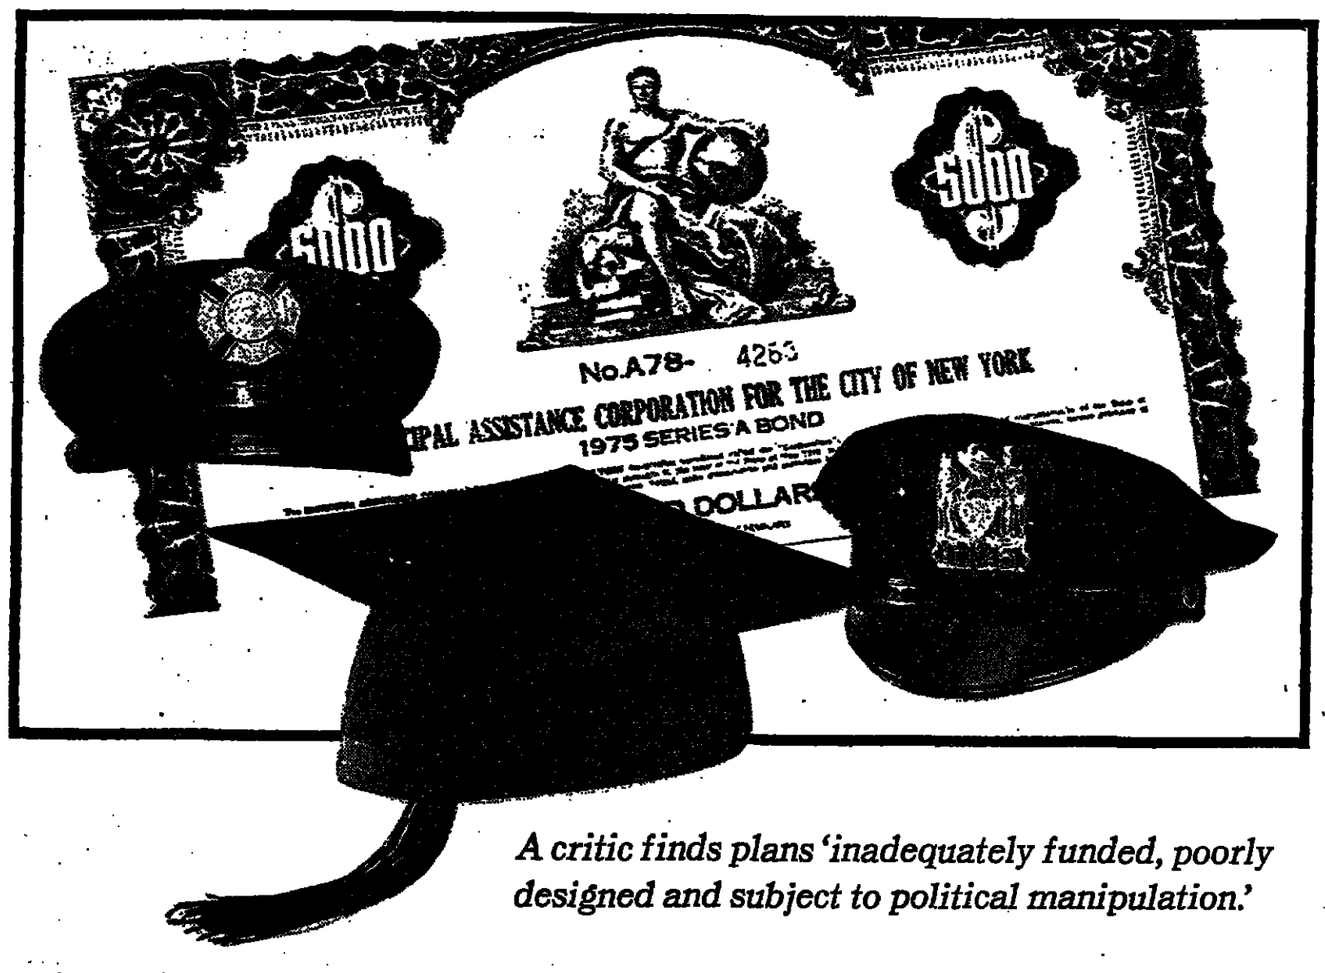
As the Kinzel Commission said, New York City "chose to use pension underfunding as one method of balancing its operating budget." Other cities and states did the same.

Congress nearly two years ago overwhelmingly passed the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, known as ERISA, to reform the funding, fiduciary and other practices of private employers' pension plans.

The law says that trustees must administer private pension plans solely in the interest of pension beneficiaries, present and future, and "with the care, skill, prudence and diligence that a prudent man familiar with such matters would use." The legislation called for a study of reform needs and the task force was appointed by the House for that purpose.

One pension expert, Dan M. McGill of the University of Pennsylvania, has asserted that "retirement systems for public employees are much more in need of regulation than the plans of private employers."

Professor McGill testified before Congress in 1972 that "as a group, public employee retirement systems are inadequately funded, poorly designed and subject to unsound political manipulation."



A critic finds plans 'inadequately funded, poorly designed and subject to political manipulation.'

Cities and states lobbied against Federal regulation, however, and Congress excluded public funds from ERISA in 1974. Since then, the pension task force has been investigating the public funds, but Congress now seems even less enthusiastic about public pension fund reform. Senator Jacob K. Javits, co-author of ERISA, recently said that "with the full enforcement of ERISA beginning for private employees, the major expansion of the act to cover the entire public employes field is premature."

The new reason for lack of Congressional enthusiasm is that, if ERISA were extended, public pension funds could be of less help or no help in rescuing cities and states, according to Congressional sources.

Under ERISA, pension funds can invest no more than 10 percent of their assets in an employer's securities. The New York City funds already have invested more than that in New York City bonds. Moreover, under ERISA's "prudent man" rule, the riskiness of the city's bonds might well preclude entirely their purchase by pension funds, according to pension task force sources.

Indeed, Congress presently is exempting New York City's pension funds from a tax law provision which says that all pension funds, to retain their tax exemptions, must be run with prudence and for the exclusive benefit of beneficiaries.

Many public pension funds for years have been run not by beneficiaries but by state treasurers, city controllers and other political officeholders.

In South Carolina, the state retirement system is run by the Governor and four other officeholders. In New York, the sole trustee of three state retirement systems with $8 billion of assets is Comptroller Arthur Levitt.

The implicit conflict of interest that results was pointed out by Al Sgaglione, president of the New York Police Conference, when Comptroller Levitt was helping to save New York City from default last fall.

"As Comptroller of the state, he sells [state] securities," Mr. Sgaglione asserted. "As trustee of the retirement systems, he's supposed to protect our money by making prudent investments."

The conflicts can become more complex. In Albany, Ga., Jim Porter Watkins wore three hats, simultaneously, the first as mayor, the second as chairman of the city's $3.3 million pension fund, and the third as director of a bank affiliate that was the fund's investment adviser.

By law or custom, public pension funds in Maine, Iowa and elsewhere are required to do business largely or exclusively with local investment advisers, brokers and banks.

Politics can produce more explicit conflicts. Former Governor David Hall of Oklahoma was indicted in January 1975 by a Federal grand jury for allegedly receiving $50,000 from a company that wanted to borrow $10 million from Oklahoma's retirement fund. Mr. Hall was sentenced to prison for attempting to give a $25,000 bribe to John Rogers, the Secretary of State and chairman of the retirement system, to secure the loan.

The politics of public pension funds largely are hidden because few funds make full disclosures to beneficiaries or taxpayers.

In California, the retirement system makes voluminous annual disclosures of investments held, securities traded and even brokerage fees paid. In New York, Comptroller Levitt reports annually on investment holdings but does not detail securities traded. More typically, the Pennsylvania retirement system issues a tiny pink annual report disclosing little but broad categories of investments held.

No one is sure even how many public pension plans exist. The Census Bureau counted 2,304 plans with total assets of $93.5 billion as of the end of 1974. The Congressional pension task force says it has identified 6,200 plans and believes there are at least 800 more smaller plans.

The total amount of unfunded liabilities of public pension funds also is unknown. But underfunding represents a huge and pervasive conflict between the interest of politicians in raising pension benefits and their interest in not simultaneously raising taxes to pay for the benefits.

Clearly, public pension funds are underfunded by many billions of dollars. The five New York City funds, according to the Kinzel Commission, were underfunded by $2 billion in just six years. The Pennsylvania Department of Community Affairs has estimated that pension funds of Pennsylvania cities were underfunded by nearly $1 billion as of 1973. The District of Columbia a year ago estimated that its pension funds were underfunded by $1.1 billion and in January revised the estimate sharply upward to $1.6 billion.

In New York, Albert Shanker, president of the United Federation of Teachers, last fall summed up the dilemma of the city and its pension funds. Mr. Shanker said he agreed to the city's use of the pension funds only under political pressure "amounting to blackmail." The alternative, he said, was worse. "Default would have been an economic, social and political catastrophe," he said.

Louis M. Kohlmeier, a Washington columnist and author, recently completed a Twentieth Century Fund study entitled "Conflicts of Interest: State and Local Pension Fund Asset Management."

a doublecross perpetrated upon them by the Administration last summer."

Grain and soybean growers were stunned in mid-1975 by the imposition of a moratorium on exports of these basic foodstuffs to the Soviet Union and Poland. The moratorium lasted from July to early October, when the Administration signed an export pact with Moscow.

Farmers, who had been encouraged by Washington to invest heavily in expanding output before the moratorium, claim they lost $2 billion in business that Canadian, Argentine and Australian producers captured after the Administration's cut off.

Earl L. Butz, the Secretary of Agriculture, who has wrested back control of his department from both the Treasury and State Department as a result of the moratorium debacle, has attributed the Administration's move to pressures from organized labor, which was manifested by the refusal of dock workers to load ships bound for Communist countries early last summer.

The Treasury, for its part, had been swept by fears of a domestic shortage of foodstuffs, and the possible refueling of inflation scarcity might produce.

Whatever the reasons for Washington's moratorium, Moscow and other foreign customers responded to it by signing long-term supply contracts with non-American suppliers. One result has been that United States exports of grain and soybeans have been lagging for months.

"What people don't realize," Mr. Turnbull noted, "is that the nation can easily export about 70 percent of its wheat, half its soybeans and a fifth of its corn each year without creating shortages."

In the last year before the 700 million bushel Soviet purchase in 1972 that resulted in the wiping out of American stocks, American farmers produced 1.6 billion bushels of wheat, 5.6 billion of corn and 1.2 billion of soybeans.

Last year, the nation produced 2.1 billion bushels of wheat, 5.8 billion of corn, and 1.5 billion of soybeans. With up to 60 percent of that presumed still unsold, contractors will start cutting the winter wheat in just a few weeks, while the corn, soybean and spring wheat harvests will begin in August.

Unless some disaster overtakes the world's major grain producers, the American stockpiles of basic foodstuffs should grow even larger in the coming months.

But the resultant downward pressure on prices is expected to be more than matched by rising food processing and marketing costs, leaving the consumer little to look forward to at the checkout counter.

And as a taxpayer, the consumer also faces a dimmer outlook. A return of the large surpluses means more pressure on Washington from hungry nations for subsidized food at little or no cost.

Washington has been flooded with requests for foodstuffs from Third World countries in recent weeks under the Public Law 480, or Food for Peace, program. Under that law, nations can apply for free foodstuffs, get credits for buying them or pay for them in their own currencies instead of dollars. Given what has happened to the values of some of the currencies involved over the years, some such "sales" have turned out to be virtual donations.

According to Agriculture Department reports, Washington has begun to comply P.L. 480 with requests from Egypt, Pakistan, Bangladesh and even such relatively prosperous countries as Australia, which was recently given credits to buy surplus soybeans.

After 1972, Washington's P.L. 480 shipments had dwindled with the nation's surpluses and the poor nations had to pay in dollars for basic foodstuffs they had received for little or no money for years.

When Washington stopped paying American farmers not to produce, an odd thing came to light—a third of the idle acreage wasn't there.

For humanitarian or political reasons it is difficult to turn away the hungry when surpluses mount. But with today's rising surpluses owned largely by commercial interests or the farmer, Washington must satisfy overseas requests by giving them credit to buy supplies from these sources, rather than simply shipping from Government stocks.

The Government's cost for P.L. 480 programs came to about $1.5 billion a year prior to 1972. After that, it dropped sharply, to as low as $100 million last year. It is expected to be considerably higher this year.

In recent weeks, credit grants by the Government have been the highest in several years and increasing each day. Last week, the Agriculture Department announced a $60 million credit to Poland alone for buying soybeans and soy products.

Further, the Agriculture Department reports that recent overseas requests have specified flour as well as grain in larger quantities than usual, a sign that foreign clients are aware of the build-up of supplies here. By obtaining flour, the recipient countries save milling expenses and time, as well as cutting down on the losses incurred in shipment and distribution of large quantities of grain.

Given the politics of an election year, Washington is expected to be open handed to the poor countries if for no other reason than to keep surpluses from rising further and thus depressing prices received by American farmers.

Another sign of rising surpluses is found in the small but increasing amount of grain being placed in "pawn" under the Federal crop loan program, which had shown few signs of life since the 1972 Soviet grain deal.

Under the loan program, farmers may borrow money by putting up crops as collateral. The Government has set loan prices for various crops and charges 7.5 percent a year interest. If the farmer doesn't redeem his crops at the end of, say, a year, the Government takes possession of the produce and the borrower need not pay back the loan.

Crops placed under loan may be delivered to Federally licensed elevators, warehouses or may remain on the farm itself in sealed bins. They are often of too poor a quality to market, but serve the farmer as a financing tool anyway.

At the end of 1971, the last full year before the 1972 Soviet deal, farmers had 586 million bushels of corn, 359 million of wheat and large amounts of other crops "pawned" with the Government.

Now when we say we take you to Sao Paulo, we take you to Sao Paulo.

The old way.

The new way.

Which is only fair.

Why should you have to come into Viracopos Airport out in the boondocks when you can just as easily land at Congonhas Airport?

Congonhas Airport is only four miles from downtown Sao Paulo.

And Sao Paulo itself is now only 11 hours, 15 minutes from N.Y. on Pan Am's Flight #211.

It leaves every day at 8:30 p.m. and arrives in Sao Paulo at 9:45 a.m. the next day.

On Thursday and Saturday it's a 747 to Rio. Other days, a 707. And every day a 737 from Rio to Sao Paulo.

So the next time you want to go to Sao Paulo, go on Pan Am. That way not only will your ticket read Sao Paulo, but you'll actually be able to land there.

OUR 125th ANNIVERSARY YEAR

Choose a lion as your guide...

Over the past several months—as so many times before—common stocks have re-emerged as one of the most hopeful forms of investment. Potentially among the most rewarding.

The Lesson of History

Yet the experience of recent years has also taught us that optimism must be accompanied by prudent caution.

We have gone through inflations and recessions; witnessed market declines as well as growth.

During this period many people withdrew from the market. Now, with prospects improving, let us not forget the lessons of the recent past—that gain is not automatic, that the market is a complicated and uncertain place, that success requires skill and good judgment.

The Investment Company

Some of you may be able to find your own way. But there are few with the time or resources to do the laborious but essential work of assessing economic trends and currency changes; evaluating the prospects of various industries and particular securities; taking advantage of the investment economies—such as reduced brokerage commissions—available to the large trader.

But The Dreyfus Corporation can do this for you, and in a variety of ways, through different investment companies with different objectives—designed to meet a diversity of investment needs.

By pooling the money of many, these companies can offer advantages once available only to the wealthy few.

And because we are solely in the money management business, we have no interest which is not similar to yours. Our success as a Company depends on your satisfaction with the way we manage your investments. Today, more than 500,000 investors have entrusted Dreyfus with the management of $3 billion of assets.

DIVERSITY. Through partnership with thousands of others you share in a great many investments which serve as protection against erratic changes of value in a few companies or segments of the economy. At the same time, you retain relatively swift access to your money.

PROFESSIONALISM. Even in a rising market not all stocks go up. It stands to reason that you may do better if you have your investment managed by full-time professionals. Through them, you have access to the latest and most comprehensive research and economic analysis. And they are at work, full-time and every day, seeking ways to up-grade your portfolio.

LARGE-SCALE ECONOMIES. Under the recently established practice by which commission rates are negotiated for each transaction, these companies—because of their size and bargaining power—pay less to buy stock. As a participant in one of our equity funds you receive the benefit of these lower trading costs no matter how small your own investment may be.

TAX RECORDS. You receive regular reports on your income and your share holdings, to be used for tax and financial planning purposes.

DIVIDEND REINVESTMENT. If you wish, your dividends may be reinvested without charge.

LIQUIDITY. Your shares can be promptly redeemed for their current value at any time without charge.

For more complete information, including charges and expenses, obtain a prospectus by calling your securities dealer or sending the coupon. Read it carefully before you invest or send money.

Consider the following Dreyfus companies in terms of your own investment objectives:

DREYFUS FUND
A conservative speculation that seeks long-term capital appreciation. It invests primarily in common stock. But it is also conservative because it holds a great variety of securities in a multitude of industries.

DREYFUS LEVERAGE FUND
Capital growth is sought through the use of more speculative investment techniques such as leveraging and short selling.

THE DREYFUS THIRD CENTURY FUND, INC.
Seeks capital growth through securities of companies which not only meet traditional investment standards but also have an impact on the quality of American life.

of the S. P. as the "best operating man in the industry."

"I think that you organize companies best with very shallow rather than very deep organizations," Mr. Jordan says. "The concepts of span of control, which are often articulated in textbooks are no more than that — a textbook idea of what you do.

"One of the real problems in American industry, in large organizations such as the railroads, is that you get such incredible depth in management that the nature of a real problem and the man dealing with it never gets to the decision maker. Instead it gets diffused and interpreted by layers of management."

Interviewed separately at Conrail's Philadelphia headquarters, Mr. Spence said he fully agreed with his new boss's management theories. "He's bringing some management organization elements to the railroad industry that in a good share long have been missing and which are very badly needed."

Railroad people will agree that Mr. Spence didn't learn this attitude at the Southern Pacific which long has profited handsomely under a traditional authoritative, hierarchical management structure.

Mr. Spence said he left his secure $100,000 a year job at the Southern Pacific for his new $135,000 a year job primarily because of the challenge of Conrail.

Industry insiders, however, suggest he also might have become disillusioned as it appeared he wasn't in line for the top post at Southern Pacific and wanted to run his own railroad.

Mr. Spence is confident he can meet the challenge of Conrail. He says his principal reason is the labor situation, considered by many observers as a minus rather than a plus.

"First of all, I believe that the railroad labor organizations feel a great identification with Conrail and they have a strong sense of responsibility for its success. They have a very cooperative attitude about where we have to go" in negotiating new agreements, he said.

He stressed that labor already has agreed to reduce agreements defining seniority districts from more than 400 to 35.

The Rail Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act, which provides for the conveyance of the properties of the bankrupt roads to Conrail, orders a start on new union agreements within 60 days. There are hundreds of individual union agreements inherited from the seven bankrupt lines. These must be restructured into a limited number of single class and craft agreements.

Mr. Spence said that both he and Mr. Jordan were most enthusiastic because unions already have agreed to permit the seven freight yards in northern New Jersey operated by five of the bankrupts to be considered as one terminal. Under separate ownership, freight shipments had to be shunted from one yard to another to satisfy the manning provisions of the unions' contracts. The biggest railroad in the country, the Burlington Northern, operates 26,000 miles of line with 42,000 workers. Conrail will go into business with about 100,000 workers, including about 3,000 on furlough. "We'll begin pruning immediately on those numbers of people," Mr. Spence said.

Mr. Spence, a native of Tucumcari, N. M., a key point on the Southern Pacific, joined that railroad in 1946 after World War II Navy service. His whole career with the S. P. was in its operating department. He has a B. S. degree from the University of California at Lost Angeles and has completed Stanford University's transportation management program and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology program for senior executives.

He said he is very happy to have moved to the East. "I like your country," he said. "I've never been happier in my life."

Before he was an insurance man, Mr. Jordan was with Computing Software Inc., a Los Angeles firm providing financial services, manpower training programs and marketing services to a number of firms.

On his qualifications for running a railroad, Mr. Jordan said: "I think each of us brings to any situation a combination of experience that we have had. Mine is a highly diversified general management experience—different businesses, troubled situations consistently, some moderate success in improving those troubled situations."

Mr. Jordan, a native Californian who received his M.B.A. from Stanford in 1953, said he was offered his first job with U. S. R. A. in 1974 by then-Secretary of Transportation, Claude S. Brinegar, on the recommendation of the Transportation Department's general counsel, Rodney Eyster, Mr. Eyster and Mr. Jordan became business friends several years ago when the lawyer handled a case for Mr. Jordan.

But even before the U. S. R. A. job was offered, Mr. Jordan said he had made up his mind to seek a job in government. "I fully expected to go to that when the U. S. R. A. asked me to consider this one. And it was a tough decision to make, frankly."

We think the market is poised for another move.

If you missed the recent upward surge of the stock market you're probably asking yourself how you can take advantage of the next move. Here at Bache Halsey Stuart, our Research Department believes we are right now in the opening stages of a significant price rise.

Which stocks do we favor?
We have just released over our newswire a review of the current situation, informing our account executives of our optimism. This report identifies a dozen issues we particularly favor now to participate in the move forward, including stocks for speculative growth, cyclical appreciation and investment. Among them are a fast-food chain whose sales have grown at a 48% annual rate for the past five years... a giant industrial technology company entering a phase of accelerating profitability... and a leading electrical supplies company that we predict will grow at an annual rate of some 14%-15% for the next several years.

Introducing the Other Value Line Survey

To most investors, 'Value Line' means The Value Line Investment Survey. And no wonder: each weekly edition of the Investment Survey is received by 50,000 subscribers making it the country's most widely read advisory service.

But did you know that Value Line publishes another service which is also dominant in its field? The Value Line Convertible Survey—which evaluates all 1200 CBOE, Amex and PBW options as well as 705 convertible bonds, preferreds and warrants—is received by 3500 investors. That's more than twice the readers of any other convertible service or (we believe) any other option service.

Admittedly we'll never have 50,000 subscribers. But if you're one of the small number of investors who are deeply involved in options and/or convertibles, then we'd like to have you as one of our 3500+ subscribers.

Let us show you how we can contribute to your option and/or convertible investing. After all, just one additional successful transaction a year could pay the cost of a subscription many times over. Why not give us a try?

☐ 3 months for $29 (12 issues). This introductory offer is available only once to any household. Check or money order for $29 must accompany order.

National differences in wage and building costs have complicated the effort to unify currencies. But this country gets little impact from turmoil.

that the countries are not homogeneous. They have different inflation rates and different interest rates.

Figures recently published by the European Common Market Commission tell the story as simply as it can be told. After making all appropriate adjustments, wage costs in industry and construction rose last year by these amounts:

West Germany—6.5 percent.
Netherlands—15 percent.
France—21.5 percent.
Britain—33 percent.
Italy—34 percent.

"There is no way," said the Federal Reserve man, "that you can maintain fixed parities in the face of differences like that."

Additionally, the turmoil of this past winter showed that the joint float is just as subject to massive movement of funds as was the old dollar-based fixed rate system. This movement is the phenomenon that some people persist in calling "speculation." It is more accurately described as a "one-way option" by which any prudent person or business goes short in a weak currency and long in a strong currency, protecting himself against loss with a good chance of gain.

The true speculators, who borrow the funds with which they take positions, can be "squeezed" by the interest costs they are paying for the borrowed money if central banks manage to maintain the existing parities long enough. This apparently happened in Europe last week. Some speculators were forced to get out, and the crisis atmosphere turned to greater calm. But it is the seemingly universal view here that the problem of the one-way option remains—and the joint float continues to be vulnerable.

What about the effect on the United States?

Again, there seems something like a consensus that there is very little impact here, at least for now. David McClain of Data Resources, Inc., the economic research firm, described recently some potential problems of added inflation—and hence a check on the economic recovery in Europe—as a result of the currency turbulence and the steep declines in several currencies. But he concluded:

"The recent currency market turmoil has been almost exclusively a European problem . . . the dollar is not overvalued now, and future currency movements are unlikely to exert a significant effect on U.S. export performance and economic recovery."

As a result of the declines in the British pound, French franc and Italian lira, the dollar's exchange rate has risen a little on an overall or "trade-weighted basis. But for a while there was an opposite concern.

The unsuccessful effort to defend the French franc and the more successful defense of the Belgian franc and several other currencies involved heavy market intervention in dollars. This added to the total supply, and the dollar declined in a sense "artificially" against the strong German mark and Swiss franc.

Reflecting on this experience, Edwin H. Yeo, the Undersecretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs, said in an interview, "It is a problem, but it is not a major problem. I think we have now seen that."

At no time did the dollar fall as much as 4 percent against the mark, compared with its value at the beginning of the year.

Mr. Yeo emphasized in a different connection that a major United States interest was that there not be any kind of competitive depreciation of currencies. But apart from suspicions of some people that the British may have indulged in a brief slight downward manipulation of the pound, this has not been a problem. The last thing the French authorities want is a steeply declining franc.

As for the monetary system as a whole, viewed in the light of the 1976 events, it is evident that the world still has what the French used to call "monetary disorder" much more than it has "monetary stability," despite all the fine words of Rambouillet. But most American businesses have learned to cope with fluctuating exchange rates and the American Government is clearly not greatly troubled by them.

And one non-vest-wearer, Ira Weinblatt, an advertising agency vice president here, said, "I avoid vests because I feel constricted with them. A suit itself is probably too warm most of the time."

Whatever advantages or disadvantages customers find in wearing vests, textile mills, garment manufacturers and retailers are all benefiting from the trend. It takes more material to make a suit with a vest than without one—and that means more dollars for every business involved.

A solid-color two-piece suit made from 60-inch-wide fabric requires 3½ yards of material. With a vest, it takes four yards. A plaid suit takes more, four yards for the basics and three-fifths of a yard for a vest, because the pattern must line up at the seams.

have little alternative to paying more and wearing less.

Vest-lovers, on the other hand, will be able to indulge themselves in far greater variety of fabrics, models and patterns.

For Telly Savalas, the star of the "Kojak" television series, it may be the opportunity of a lifetime. Mr. Savalas gets a free wardrobe from the makers of Botany 500 clothes in return for "promotional considerations." According to Botany, Mr. Savalas really likes vests.

$17.50 to the wholesale price of a suit and $20 to $35 to the retail price, depending on quality. One manufacturer reports that a "popular price" suit selling in the stores for $150 without a vest would cost $175 as a vested suit.

"The cost of a vest is not so much in the fabric as in the other expenses of making it," said B. G. Cox, president of the Joseph & Feiss Company. "There are the buttons, the buttonholes, the pockets, the back strap. Our vest costs us more to make than a pair of pants."

Mr. Cox said that his total costs, for material, labor and overhead expense, are more than $10 a vest. He then sells it for $12.50 to a retailer, whose own normal markup results in a price to the public of $25.

The higher three-piece-suit prices have to be paid, of course, by those who wear only the jacket and trousers and discard the vest.

Plus Specific Recommendations on How to Build Capital in the Market Ahead

IF YOU ARE CONVINCED that the market must go up in an election year and therefore stock prices will keep rising onward and upward, don't bother to read any further.

But if you agree with us that, as a result of the recent upsurge, most stocks have become overpriced and that the risks of holding stocks have mounted, we believe you will find our offer below attractive.

Specifically, we think investors should sell most of their stocks now because:

- Contrary to widespread expectations, long-term investors are not returning to the market. As the recent upsurge in mutual-fund redemptions attests, the investing public has actually responded to rising stock prices by increasing their liquidation.
- In the last few months, purchases by financial institutions have been exceptionally intense. As a result, not many funds have much buying power left.
- Most other recent stock buyers are in-and-out speculators. The shares they've acquired are, therefore, currently overhanging the market.
- Since the turn of the year, commercial banks have experienced an unusually sharp drop in large negotiable certificates of deposit (CD's). The resultant liquidity squeeze will cause interest rates to climb. That could intensify the shift of investment capital from equities to bonds and other high-yield securities.

EYE-OPENING STUDIES

In a series of flow-of-funds and monetary studies, The Holt Investment Advisory has analyzed some of the little-noticed but highly significant developments in the banking system as well as in the stock market. It explains in considerable detail why we believe the risks of buying and holding stocks have become unacceptably large.

This issue of the Advisory also presents a complete list of securities to implement Holt's latest Recommended Investment Strategy for capital building in the market environment ahead.

WARNING: Our view of the market is distinctly different from that of most investment experts, who are now unreservedly bullish. Back in late 1974, when the Dow was around 600 and Wall Street was deep in gloom, we were also conspicuously in the minority—advising investors to buy bargains aggressively. It's always possible that "they" will be right this time.

Nevertheless, unless you, too, are unyieldingly bullish, you will probably find the logic behind Holt's research compelling—so much so that you will want to read these special reports over and over again.

Bill Furman defines "professional."

Sometimes, the fastest way to find out about a word is to look it up in a dictionary. Other times, you can just look at a good example.

Our definition of "professional" is a good example: Bill Furman. A top notch agent who led New England Life in sales volume in 1975, with $14,613,348.

Bill Furman is as active a member of his home community as he is of the life insurance industry. He is a trustee on the Board of Directors of The Newark Beth Israel Medical Center, and has served as chairman of the Major Gift Division for United Way. He is a recipient of the Julius H. Cohn Award for outstanding leadership and service in community affairs, and is currently chairman of his town's Budget Advisory Committee.

INVESTING

Sellers Hit Mutual Funds

By RICHARD PHALON

Although Wall Street in general has never had it so good, thanks to the record upsurge in stock trading volume this year, the mutual fund industry is trapped in a paradox.

Sales of new shares are pounding along at relatively high levels, but redemptions are running at even higher levels.

In all of last year, investors bought $3.3 billion worth of new shares, but turned in $3.7 billion worth of old shares for net redemptions of $400 million.

The trend continued in January, when $410.7 million worth of new sales was swallowed up by $537.9 million of redemptions. In February things were even worse. Sales fell to $261.5 million and redemptions climbed to $571.1-million, leaving the industry with record net redemptions of $309.6-million.

Those numbers do not include the highly popular money market funds, but some of them are beginning to encounter redemption problems of their own.

Bull markets have traditionally been something of a bête noire for the mutual fund industry. "In rising stock markets," Robert L. Augenblick, president of the Investment Company Institute said last week, "we've tended to show both rising sales and rising redemptions."

This time, however, "it's a little different," he said. "We haven't had quite the same increase in sales."

Some of the reasons for the heavy redemptions appear to lie deep in the investor psyche. Many of the shareholders bailing out of the funds appear to have bought their shares at or near the top of the last bull market in the early 1970's.

"A lot of people who bought equities around then were hurt" by the three-year bear market that followed, Mr. Augenblick said. Now that the market has come back, he continued, "they're saying, 'if I can break even and maybe make a little profit, I'll get out.'"

Investor fears about the advisability of holding equities, even in a rampageous bull market, have been compounded by the recession and high unemployment.

Further, with the restrictions clamped by the Securities & Exchange Commission over the last several years on the way mutual funds can be sold, a lot of commission profit—and with it some salesman enthusiasm—has disappeared from the business.

Another analyst noted a very high rate of attrition among mutual fund salesmen, who began looking for greener marketing pastures when the sales curve began trending downward two or three years ago.

Dealer organizations, with platoons of salesmen, have turned their efforts elsewhere, too. "You need dealer support," the analyst continued—he asked not to be identified in this account—because "it brings new money in and helps to hold the old money in, too."

Basic commission schedules aside, a salesman can make more money pushing options than he can by selling mutual funds. Options—the right to buy a stock at a set price over a set time period — by definition turn over much more rapidly than the average mutual fund account.

The industry has tried to solve some of its sales problems by developing and packaging new types of funds designed to capitalize on whatever market trend seems to be taking off at the moment.

One of the most successful examples of that kind of packaging is the money market funds. Concentrating on Treasury bills, certificates of deposit and other money market instruments, they proved easy to sell last year and the year before when short-term interest rates all but went through the roof.

Now that those rates have come down, the money market funds have begun to loose headway, though many investors still find them useful places to "park" temporarily idle money at comparatively high rates of interest and comparatively low risk.

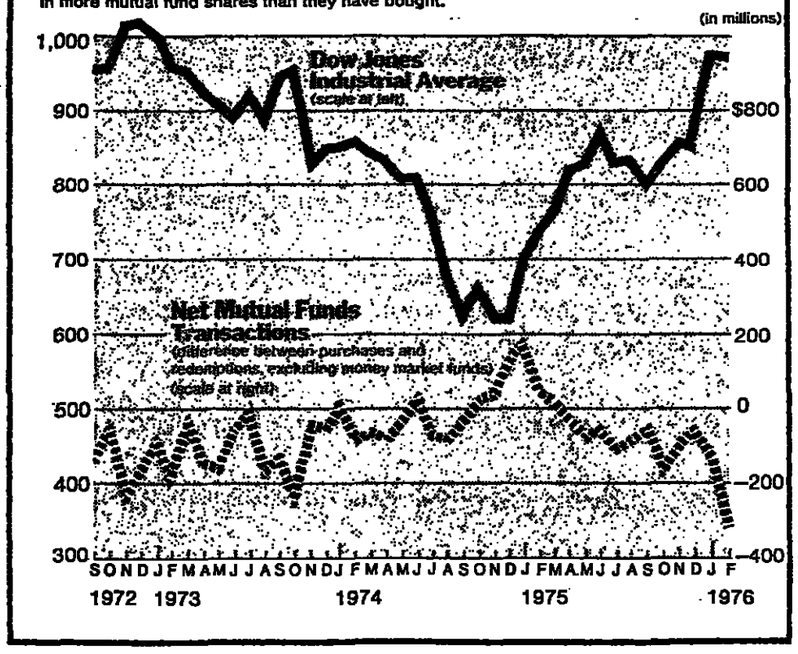
The money market funds last year generated better than 60 percent of the industry's total sales—$6.7 billion of the more than $10 billion that came in for all types of funds. Redemptions in the money market funds amounted to $5.9 billion, leaving the money market funds in a net sales position.

As always, new money—and low redemption rates—tend to gravitate towards performance. Thus, funds that have done well in the market—some per share asset values are up 30 percent or more so far this year—are having no sales problems.

Among the best performers so far this year, according to Lipper Analytical Services, are the Resources Growth Fund (up 55.1 percent) and the Cumulo Alternate Fund (up 45.7 percent).

The Market and Mutual Funds

As stock market prices have risen, investors have cashed in more mutual fund shares than they have bought.



For Best Performing Shelter

son or corporation at or near the 50 percent tax bracket, the extra $300,000, at the least, means additional income of $150,000 usually spread over several years. In effect, it is a tax free loan from other tax payers that can be used to buy tax free municipal bonds or invested elsewhere.

If the movie is a hit, investors have a potential of enormous profit; multiples of two to three times or more during a two or three year period are not uncommon, although some may also lose money on their film investments.

In the more likely event that the movie is not a hit, investors must report as income the box office receipts that are used to pay off the loan. Thus, the Internal Revenue Service recaptures the deduction. But this usually takes three or four years. The investor has not only free use of the funds over the years but the chance of hitting on a smash, and he may find an alternate tax shelter when it is time for the Government to recapture the deductions.

Growth of the movie tax shelter field has created a new type of power broker to be courted by film producers. Loosely called "packagers," they evaluate proposed motion pictures, study the script and cast and then, if they think it is a good investment, put together a syndicate of high income investors.

Few filmgoers have heard of such men as Burton W. Kanter, Stephen Sharmat, Larry Gordon, Lester Persky or Richard Bright. But, along with other film packagers, such men collectively are beginning to have as much influence as studio moguls.

Based mostly in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles, they are approached daily with ideas for new movies. And some eventually reach the screen. Among films financed, at least in part through shelter money are "Funny Lady," "The Great Gatsby," "The Day of the Locust," "Shampoo," and "Taxi Driver."

The business appears to have attracted scores, possibly hundreds, of fringe wheeler-dealers. At least one is known to stage parties periodically for his investors in which prostitutes are introduced as "starlets." Sex is a common come-on to some of the investors at the fringe of the business, say men involved in movie shelters.

Whatever comes of the current Congressional review, it is expected to look hard at the deals involving foreign-made films. Many of the reported abuses linked to movie tax shelters stem from the films at inflated prices that investors never intend to pay. They put 5 percent to 10 percent cash into a deal, perhaps $100,000 on a purchase price of, say, $2 million for the film. They deduct depreciation and investment tax credits based on the $2 million, but that's a fictitious price. The balance is owed to foreign distributors, but often is never repaid. The distributors may know they won't be paid the $2 million but accept anything to get some payment for a poor film.

Some theaters have specialized in showing such tax shelter films, perhaps only for a day or two, to qualify them for tax purposes. Some films have shown up briefly on cable television and nowhere else. Some pornographic films are financed with tax shelter money, but most industry people say the number is relatively small because outside money usually isn't needed for the low cost hard core epics.

Because major studios won't talk and the invisibility of many deals, nobody knows exactly how many films are made with shelter money. Arthur Rockwell, a securities analyst for San Francisco's Sutro & Company, estimates it probably accounts for no more than 15 percent of total film production, but it is much more important to independent producers than to most big studios.

According to Mr. Rockwell and others, the major exception among the big producers is Columbia. It raised about $15-million of its $40 million production budget through outside investments last fiscal year, and is believed to be obtaining a much higher proportion of its capital this way currently.

United Artists is estimated to have raised about 20 percent of its $52 million production budget last year from tax shelter investors. Smaller amounts went into production at Warner Brothers, Paramount, American International Pictures, and Allied Artists.

No outside money was used by 20th Century Fox, Walt Disney Productions, or MCA, the parent company of Universal Studios, whose blockbuster hit, "Jaws" was a good part of the company's $95.5 million profit last year.

"We have never used tax shelter money and we have no intention of doing so," said Lew R. Wasserman, the chairman of MCA.

The main argument of the management-labor-exhibitors coalition for the shelters is that they are needed to keep new films coming and to keep the industry's technicians and actors working.

The impact of tax law changes is unclear. Most movie makers appear to agree with Stanley Kramer, the director, who said in an interview, "You'd have a lot less production." But, an official of 20th Century Fox, declining to be identified, said tax shelters meant more poor quality films.

"We've tried to make it clear in Washington that we don't think tax shelters are good for the industry," he said. "There are too many abuses that come very close to fraud."

"The trouble with tax shelters is that they are usually not based on normal business principles, but on tax consideration. You've got more and more people going into the business, and you're losing the quality of the product. It was the same thing when you had gentlemen farmers going into farming. They ran up the price of real estate, but weren't necessarily good farmers."

However, Burton Marcus, vice president and general counsel of Columbia Pictures, said: "We need everything we can to stimulate production. The number of films has been contracting since 1950, and it's getting worse." He says the tax benefits are the rewards of an investment of "high risk venture capital." He admits there have been abuses, but says: "There are schlock operators at the fringes of any business."

Mr. Marcus is the principal author of the industry's counter proposal to Congress to modify the tax incentives with a 25 percent minimum down payment for the leveraged non-recourse loans; a five year limit on the payment of the loans; and a limitation of the tax breaks only to movies made predominantly in the United States.

David Londoner, a vice president of Wertheim & Company, and a Wall Street entertainment analyst, said abolition "would benefit the MCA's, the Paramounts, the bigger well-capitalized companies, but it would make it harder for Columbia and the independent producers. But, there's no doubt there have been lots of abuses."

Opponents of reform say creative, independent film makers would be starved for capital and captives of the large studios.

But Eric Pleskow, who heads United Artists, said that while he supports and uses tax shelters, an independent, "if he has a good idea and a good package, will not find it difficult to get financing" even if the law was changed.

Saul Zoentz, chairman of Fantasy Records in Berkeley, Calif., who co-produced "One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest" which will be in the running for nine Academy Awards tomorrow night, said he had trouble raising the $4.1 million to produce the film. But he and his partner opted against shelter money.

Instead, he said they raised the money among friends and associates and banks, largely because they didn't want to risk losing control of the film to the outside investors. "We believed in what we had, and felt we should do it ourselves," he said.

"While I sometimes find it difficult to agree with The Times, I find it equally difficult to get along without The Times. New York City's Costly Tax Exemptions

By GERALD BENJAMIN

When the next round of budget-cutting hits New York's city university and its public-school system, will the following item remain untouched, as it has been thus far?

Assistance to private elementary and secondary schools and colleges. .$90,985,000

And how many of the cutbacks in health services and social welfare will be absorbed in these three items:

Aid for private, state, and federal health care facilities $103,736,000
Aid to private charitable organizations ...$24,641,000
Aid to religious organizations $65,041,000

None of these items will be cut because none appear in the municipal budget. Yet all are genuine expenses of the City of New York. They comprise a fraction of New York's "tax expenditures," the revenue that the city foregoes because of special tax treatment given the property of the Federal and state governments, public authorities, private and parochial colleges and schools, independent hospitals and other disparate institutions and individuals.

The accompanying table demonstrates that the total of tax expenditures by New York City for this year is more than $923 million —not counting property that the city owns itself. Because these expenditures are made on the revenue side, rather than on the expense side, of the city budget, they are virtually invisible. Unlike other government outlays, tax expenditures are not periodically brought to public attention in the annual political battles over the allocation of the city's increasingly scarce resources.

Once established in state and local law, they are automatic. Regular expenditures require action by the city government before they are made. Tax expenditures are made if the government does nothing.

Two examples will help to clarify these points.

¶Partial tax exemptions for property owned by military veterans will cost the city $16,254,530 this year. A veteran who owns a one-family house in Queens, for instance, and takes full advantage of his exemption will pay about $41 less in taxes this year than a neighbor who owns a similar house but has not served in the military.

This exemption is the result of a state policy first established in 1823. The most recent change in it, passed in 1968, extended its application to Vietnam veterans. Because of its invisibility, however, the policy itself has not received serious review in recent times. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine that lobbyists for veterans, a group that enjoys enormous benefits provided by the Federal Government, could shepherd a $16.2 million city subsidy through the budgetary process in a year in which policemen, firemen, teachers and other city employees are being dismissed.

¶Cemetery property within the city is exempt from taxation as a result of legislation first passed by the state in 1847, and not altered since 1938. In the context of contemporary events and attitudes, it is clear that an owner of cemetery property within the city limits would be hard pressed to justify the $14.1 million city subsidy of cemeteries, especially in light of the fact that their counterparts in some other states get along quite nicely without such help.

As is evident from these two examples, tax expenditures, like many other city outlays, are often mandated by the state.

For private education and health-care facilities and for religious organizations, these mandates are in the state Constitution. For veterans and cemeteries (among others), they are in the Real Property Law. Further, the legal principle of "sovereign immunity" prevents city taxation of Federal or state facilities without the consent of those governments. Faced with these entrenched mandates, reformers have traditionally thrown up their hands and claimed that there was little the city could do to avoid such outlays.

The Mayor, however, annually goes hat in hand to Albany to seek state aid and new taxing authority. Certainly he could include in his tax package the modification of tax expenditures based upon the Real Property Law, and begin to population on the need for revision as well.

The legislature would not all tax expenditures in the state reform in New York City; it build a local option into th
as it has in the tax-relief prog citizens. The city could then

It is not likely that such would make New York's p more courageous about bud

In 1971, the legislature d

tax exemptions optional for m

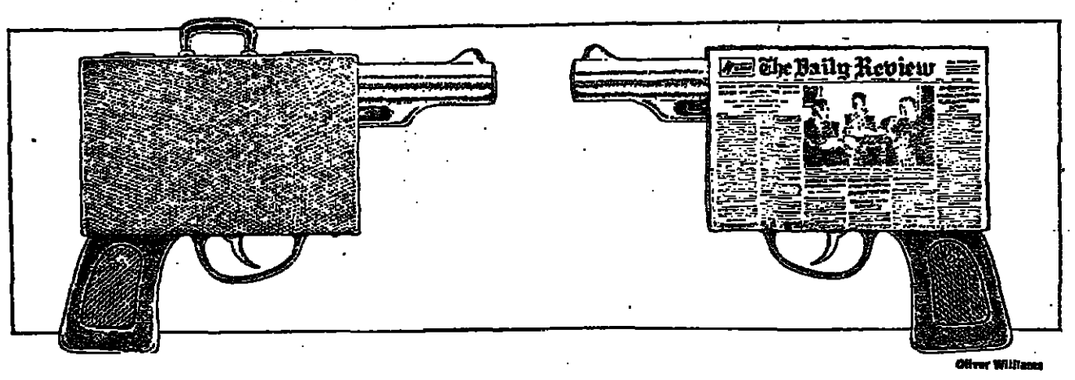
Business Versus The Press



Oliver Williams

To the Financial Editor:

Donald S. MacNaughton's criticism of the press "The Businessman Versus the Journalist" (March 7) must have raised gales of Homeric laughter in the newsrooms across the country.

The insurance executive says that "Most of us are fed up with glib, shallow, inaccurate reporting and editing."

I wonder how many of us are fed up with shoddy merchandise, lying advertising, planned obsolence, fixed prices, bribery of officials, destruction of the environment and all the other ills foisted upon us by his business bedfellows.

Mr. MacNaughton hopes that someday newspapermen and businessmen "will be able to meet with more amicable reflexes." Nothing reveals better his abysmal ignorance of the escence of the press. Businessmen need amicability to survive (they can't sell without it). Newspapermen don't.

It is gratifying to see prominent businessmen thinking about a free press, as many are doing these days, but distressing to realize the limits of their understanding.

For example, Mr. MacNaughton implies there are no standards of journalism today.

Also distressing is Mr. MacNaughton's lack of concern about the First Amendment guarantee of his own right to express himself. He seems to view members of the press as "them" and the rest of the people as "us." The First Amendment is an umbrella which covers all.

It should not be possible for anyone to be a reporter or editor without acquiring "the necessary credentials by way of a sound training program," says Mr. MacNaughton. "Nor for another example, should the press discourse on any subject, particularly complex ones, except through members with an expertise in the subject."

Sound training and expertise are desirable. The news organizations which have achieved a mass following in the marketplace of ideas rely on sound training and expertise. But to require them before anyone may set words to paper means establishing an organization to license newsmen.

If the printed word is to be regulated in that fashion, why stop at the reporters on the big dailies, newsmagazines and networks? Why not regulate also those who write for trade journals, literary magazines, newsletters, party organs and club bulletins?

Why not regulate the authors of books and their editors? For that matter, could the bearded revolutionary distributing leaflets in the Port Authority bus terminal be exempted?

How punish the offense of practicing journalism without a license? How police the standards? How guard against the unauthorized use of Xerox machines by the underground press?

More to the point, why? Might not one of the standards become, as it has in India, the avoidance of criticism of government leaders?

Mr. MacNaughton can claim that a law degree and admission to the bar are the credentials which authorize him to talk about First Amendment rights. Clearly, he needs to think through the implications of proposals to limit those rights.

Mr. MacNaughton presented an extremely cogent analysis of the adversary relationship between industry and journalism.

In trying to reconcile the controversy he missed one crucial point. Irrespective how you slice it, the press is a business; in fact, taken in aggregate, a rather large business.

The revenue of a newspaper or a magazine (subscription and advertising) is closely correlated to the strength of its circulation.

The print and broadcast media go to great lengths to research their present and projected market areas. Once a market profile is defined, the media (especially television) try to present the news and news formats appropriate to their audience. Does this not sound like a business?

The resulting severity of competition for the market among the various media seems to intensify sensational journalism.

This is not a question of the protection of free and objective reporting. But when the media business "sell" shoddy products, they too have to be made accountable as have auto manufacturers and food processors.

Douglas Cooper, Chao Kwan's chief architect, said that Chinese restaurants with a basic, "unimaginative" theme tend to generate only basic profits while the "really profitable" restaurants are those providing a combination of good food and atmosphere. All the materials the prefabricated restaurant needs are packed into huge containers which can be assembled on site within 15 days by a labor crew. Last week the President asked Congress to authorize the expenditure of $135 million to produce anti-influenza vaccines for public innoculations. Biologists say it will take between 50 million and 100 million eggs to grow the influenza viruses needed to make the vaccines.

That may seem a lot of eggs, but Americans consumed an estimated 65 billion of them last year, compared with roughly 68 billion in 1974. The decline in egg consumption is expected to continue this year leaving plenty for vaccines.

Yet egg prices may climb because farmers, squeezed by rising costs, are expected to sharply reduce flocks of hens after Easter.

"But we feel that by setting some kind of price limit on the dinners from now on, we'll be able to offer more of them in other cities. The $200 was subjective. It just seemed a likely amount for a really exceptional dinner for two." Mr. Claiborne, a New York Times food critic, bought such an American Express dinner on a TV auction, but there was no price limit at the time.

No one has won the latest dinner yet, though. Only about 40 of 250 donated gifts were auctioned at the March 6 benefit for seven Brooklyn cultural institutions.

"We got a tremendous number of phony phone calls from people who would bid $60,000 for a $400 item," explained one of the auction's coordinators. "And so we will have to hold another auction."

An Annual Report with Room for Critics

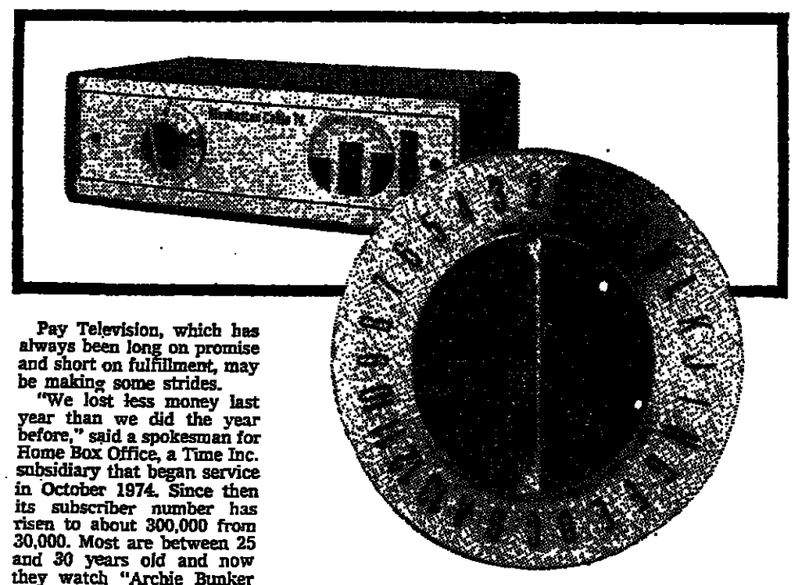
Cyclops Corporation, a Pittsburgh specialty steel producer, lets some critics have their say in its annual report. Comments of eight outsiders including an economist, an investment analyst, a shareholder, customers, and I. W. Abel, president of the United Steelworkers Union, were printed in the 1975 report.

Walter Bott, an 83 year old retired New Yorker, the shareholder, complained he was disappointed in his Cyclops investment because of the low price of its stock. "I have several investments and Cyclops is the only one in which I have lost," he wrote in the annual report.

Robert U. Clemence, president of a tool making firm and a Cyclops customer, wrote that deliveries suffered because of an equipment outage at Cyclops. Theodore Gerken, an investment analyst, wrote "I would have been happier if they passed the dividend, rather than just cutting it from 35 to 25 cents." Each critique was answered by William H. Knoell, Cyclops president.

The idea came from H.W. Delano, the company's public relations director. "In an annual report you're always trying to boost the readership, at least I am," he said. "It had criticism, but lots of bouquets, too." The key was having a non-management interviewer that wouldn't pussyfoot in seeking comments, he said. "We said let it all hang out." And so far Cyclops has no regrets, he said.

Paying for Prime Time



Pay Television, which has always been long on promise and short on fulfillment, may be making some strides.

"We lost less money last year than we did the year before," said a spokesman for Home Box Office, a Time Inc. subsidiary that began service in October 1974. Since then its subscriber number has risen to about 300,000 from 30,000. Most are between 25 and 30 years old and now they watch "Archie Bunker and Mary Tyler Moore and the Home Box Office programs, spending more hours in front of the TV," the spokesman said.

This month, for example, Home Box Office, which is the biggest pay TV operation in the nation, offers movies such as "Murder on the Orient Express," "The Wind and the Lion," "Chinatown," and such foreign oldies as "Hiroshima, Mon Amour" and "Stolen Kisses." Of course, there are lesser known movie offerings, too, such as "Badge 373," "Return to Macon County" and "Framed" and films on the old 1964 Olympics.

Time's Home Box Office sells to about 125 affiliates in 23 states. The local cable stations usually charge customers about $15 for cable installation and $19 a month for H.B.O.'s program, with half the $19 going back to H.B.O. Of course, some subscribers don't always pay, and competition from the networks holds down growth.

"Some of the services that we talked about for so long are now available," said Joseph Taylor, president of Manhattan Teleprompter, one of New York City's cable tv stations.

In which the Muses loom large and an offer is made to Helios.

In our society bankers serve as managers of the money machine. They are yea-sayers and nay-sayers in matters that really count with people. For what, pray tell, is more intimate to the business of our life and work than money? Whatever need it sustains —our daily necessities, our occupation or business, education, travel, cultural enterprise, charity—money remains the earnest of our success or failure and a tether on hopes yet to be fulfilled. And almost always, there isn't enough.

As your sprightly Richard Armour noted in a light quatrain:

"That money talks,
I won't deny;
I heard it once,
It said 'Goodbye.'"

It was one of your more remarkable daughters, O Muses, the inimitable Gertrude Stein, who put it a little differently when she wrote that money is always there but the pockets change.

It is understandable that the tellers of tales and the versifiers need a rascal—or on occasion a villain—in the drama of life which it is their unique mission to depict. Good versus evil. Strong versus weak. Right versus wrong. Thus is the plot sharpened and the blame for the human condition assessed.

Be all that as it may, good Muses, surely it is well to push out the horizon of understanding in certain directions. I suggest four briefly:

¶Bankers handle other people's money. Loans and investments are made with resources provided by depositors, shareowners and others who place funds with the bank and who are as protective toward their money as prospective borrowers are eager to hire it. This fiduciary responsibility requires even the most warm-hearted lender to temper concern with prudence.

¶Bankers can discharge their responsibilities only if they operate strong, capable institutions. This means high standards of service, making loans that can be repaid, investing in obligations of quality, being a good corporate citizen in ways consistent with a bank's role in the community. Making bad loans to good causes is not banking's job in a proper division of labor among the financial and fiscal institutions of the society. Curiously enough, some critics are selectively silent on the subject of bank loan losses for reasons that perhaps are not far to seek.

¶Banker are answerable to duly constituted public authorities—tiers of them—who rightly expect high standards of performance. Accumulating classified loans and substandard investments, as judged by these guardians of the public interest, is not the route to a future in the business.

¶Bankers charge prices, i.e. interest rates, that reflect their costs, including the major expense of interest paid on funds acquired to lend and invest. The margin between rates charged and paid is a key factor in determining bank revenue that has to cover staff salaries and benefits together with other expenses, as well as Federal, state and local taxes, dividends for shareowners and earnings retained for future growth.

I fear, O Muses, I have become rather didactic in this plea for understanding among your practitioners of pen and typewriter, but I trust you will judge it relevant. I realize further that certain stylistic barriers exist to a full rapport. For example, the words "A thing of beauty is a deposit forever" hardly qualify as language destined for immortality. Nor, I must admit, does the rubric "Securities Sold Under Agreement to Repurchase" scan very well. Indeed, ledgers and discounts and the whole nomenclature of our profession are not likely to incite the imagination of those whose words can stir the soaring angels of human nature.

We seek, of course, not so high a heave. Rather we look only for the understanding that can curb misconception and ill-will and help lift us all to the higher ground of a knowledgeable citizenry.

An ode, a lyric or two, so imbued, would help.

Sincerely,
Gabriel Hauge

reasons for their fears about a regen- onary pressures, economists generally elief that the recent stability in food ill not continue much longer; the ex- ces of other commodities will become overy develops greater steam, and the e wage settlements in the key labor d this year.

recent readings of the consumer and ndexes have gladdened the hearts of some analysts feel their steadiness ed many false hopes.

vide one example of the threat. Grain stagnant for months chiefly because were ample and exports have been far. But exports, particularly to the Japan, are expected to increase soon. ernment's grain shipments under the 'or Peace" program, if for no other ep farm prices up during an election some commodity analysts.

ld perhaps half of the 1975 crops and hard price bargains with Washington rchase food to send abroad as aid. If prove disappointing, price pressures engthen.

Livestock prices are also expected to rise by midyear or earlier because the nation's herds were sharply reduced before grain prices sagged last fall. Moreover, labor, transport and other processing costs have been rising and will be passed on to consumers.

In the industrial commodity sector, particularly the metals, prices are also firming — not because demand is rising significantly but because production costs have been. It has been cost-push, not demand-pull, that has been responsible so far for tilting prices upward. Lumber prices, for instance, have been soaring since last September — long before any pick up was sighted in construction. And the commodity spot market index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows a fairly sharp rise in metals and industrial materials this year.

The demand-pull factor in price increases will come along when housing, equipment makers and other producers step up their output in response to the gathering strength of consumer buying. Gasoline prices may be going up soon again when the big motoring season arrives, and other energy prices may also rise as the economy gathers strength.

The worry about big labor settlements this year seems to be well-based, too. The next two months should provide a good example of how the winds will blow in that area, with contracts to be negotiated for 410,000 truckers, 68,000 rubber workers and 670,000 in the construction trades. Later on in the summer will come the key tests at General Electric, Westinghouse and the automobile industry.

In a rundown on the upcoming bargaining, the Morgan Guaranty Survey commented last week: "A pattern of outsized gains in rubber, electrical and other industries — if it develops—could doom any hopes of further sizable gains on the inflation front. Unionized workers, it is true, account for only about one worker in every four in the work force. But nonunion workers, too, will be seeking to boost real wages this year—an aim that was restrained in 1975 by the severity of the business slump.

"While few labor analysts fear a new surge in the wage spiral which would bring accelerating inflation, the prospect of wage increases among private nonfarm workers in the 8 percent to 9 percent range would seem to preclude a sustained inflation rate below 5 percent or so in 1976."

Some other analysts are more apprehensive about the likely size of this year's settlements. Mr. Evans of Chase Econometrics expects the agreements to average about 11 percent for the first year of the new contracts, but with the eventual settlement in the rubber industry running perhaps upward of 15 percent.

While the auto negotiations in September may be the single most important agreement to be worked out this year, some observers view the rubber talks next month as equally pivotal. In the industry's last contract negotiated during the Phase III period of wage-price controls in 1973, no cost-of-living adjustments were provided. Thus, rubber workers have fared poorly relative to other industrial workers the last three years. So, there is a catch-up aspect to those negotiations that complicates them and possibly heightens a strike threat.

There is also a threat to the present serenity on the inflation front from actions that might be taken in Congress to boost spending to aid employment if the Federal budget deficit widens greatly.

On the international scene, the recent currency jitters provide mixed blessings. They should provide a lesson on the importance of keeping inflation under better control and on the fact that currencies cannot be held in close alignment when monetary and fiscal policies are not also kept in alignment.

The countries whose currencies have been most depressed are the ones where inflation raged the worst in 1975 and where fiscal and monetary restraint was most relaxed. Britain, for instance, had an inflation rate of 24.3 percent, Italy's was 17 percent and the rate in France was 11.7 percent. By contrast, in the strong-currency countries, West Germany's inflation was 6 percent, Switzerland's was 6.7 percent and the United States' was 9 percent.

The risks in the unsettled currency situation are twofold: competitive devaluations that would affect trade patterns and the possibility of tariff reprisals by countries affected by any further devaluations in Europe—even though increased exports by Britain, Italy and France would not only help their own economies but perhaps also help to subdue inflation in this country.

Obviously, with inflation and trade problems, as well as energy, capital-formation and municipal problems, politicians and economists here and abroad have plenty to worry about these days. It doesn't seem likely that 1976 will turn out to be a "dull year."

Sentiment in all markets appeared to have improved in a direct reflection of the continued signs of upturn in the United States economy. These signs, coupled with currency uncertainties abroad, also continued to attract overseas investors to American investment markets.

The week's new financings in the credit markets were, for the most part, well absorbed. There has been less and less talk of the fears raised not so many months back of "crowding out," wherein increased Government borrowing would not only drive up interest rates but also make access to the marketplace difficult if not impossible for private sector borrowers.

AFRAID TO QUIT?
Progressive Companies Are Always Looking

If you've been thinking about quitting, the chances are that you should. It's better than waiting until you're fired. Because people who are unhappy with their jobs are also non-productive and poorly rewarded. And they're the first to go when the going gets tough. If you're earning $17,000 . . . or $70,000 annually, a work situation which is better suited to your talents is bound to be more satisfying, more rewarding and more secure. To find out how to make the most of your talents—and how to find greater satisfaction in what you do—why not phone or write for a confidential interview. No cost. No obligation. You'll wonder why you didn't quit a whole lot sooner.

not be the only candidates seeking the nomination. Not only are they both vulnerable on the Watergate issue, Mr. Reagan is a conservative of the school of Senator Barry Goldwater of Arizona, which produces philosophic purists but, at the national level at least, electoral disasters. Mr. Ford, though an incumbent, is being rejected by half of his party's voters. It is a situation in which an optimistic Republican leader might see an opening.

The Democrats. The North Carolina results did not alter the Democrats' positions much. Jimmy Carter, former Governor of Georgia, received 54 percent of the vote, Gov. George Wallace of Alabama 35 percent. The outcome appeared to have shaken Mr. Wallace, who now is less likely to assert important influence at the Democratic convention. Mr. Carter's showing again affirmed his stature, but he was running only against Mr. Wallace who, though disappointed, still was the preference of a sizable minority over Mr. Carter.

The Democratic field remains the same in size though not in identity. Sargent Shriver has dropped out, Senator Frank Church of Idaho has entered. The probability remains that no Democrat will have the nomination in hand until shortly before the convention, if then.

African Juncture: War or Peace?

The white rulers and black nationalists seeking a negotiated settlement in Rhodesia have come to a dangerous impasse, and they are not backing away from it. Though much is still unknown about their intentions, the single clear fact of the collapse of peace talks has had major effects ranging from quiet diplomacy to warnings and threats involving the United States, Cuba, Russia, France, Britain and the countries of southern Africa.

The harsh talk could be the herald of a major war in southern Africa. It also could be talk in lieu of war—frantic attempts to keep open the narrowing possibility of a solution.

There is evidence to support either conclusion.

The possibility of war. Talks broke down nine days ago between Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith and Joshua Nkomo, leader of a relatively moderate, Rhodesia-based faction of the principal political organization of Rhodesian blacks. Mr. Nkomo has now moved closer to the war-is-inevitable position of Bishop Abel Muzorewa, a rival leader in the same nationalist organization. His forces have been waging intensified guerrilla border fighting against Rhodesia.

Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Muzorewa met last week with leaders of four neighboring black African states to plan increased guerrilla warfare. The Nkomo-Muzorewa differences were not resolved, but it now seems more likely that there can be greater military action against the Smith Government.

Last week, Britain publicly offered to insure an orderly transition in Rhodesia if the Rhodesian Government would agree to accept the principle of black rule and to hold, within two years, the elections that would bring blacks to power. Mr. Smith, who has ignored pressure from London as well as the rest of the world, rejected the proposal.

The emphasized isolation of the white minority government could mean that the blacks of Rhodesia, and the black governments in neighboring nations, will be less reluctant to try to bring Mr. Smith down.

There are about 12,000 Cuban soldiers still in Angola. Prime Minister Fidel Castro has said they will stay in the area, available to aid black liberation armies, and Bishop Muzorewa said last week he may ask for that help.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger now has warned that the United States "will not accept any further Cuban military adventures." He refused to rule out any diplomatic or military measures and the Ford Administration let it become known that it is developing contingency plans for possible use against Cuba.

The possibility of peace. There are numerous reasons why leaders of the black-ruled nations in southern Africa would want to avoid a war—the superior force of the Rhodesian army, the possibility that South Africa's even stronger army would intervene on Rhodesia's side, the effect a war would have on their struggling economies and their apprehension over long-lasting Soviet-Cuban influence in the region.

It may be, therefore, that the four-sided meeting last week and the silence that followed it signified a decision for restraint. Britain's offer to mediate may look better to Mr. Smith if South Africa and Botswana increase the diplomatic and economic pressure on him.

Cuba and the Soviet Union have been saying and doing little in Southern Africa in recent weeks. That could indicate they do not mean to support intensified warfare against Rhodesia now; it could also mean they are reacting to Mr. Kissinger's unspecific threats, which have been reinforced privately by the British and French.

It is also possible that Mr. Kissinger was speaking in part for candidate Ford as well as for President Ford. The candidate-President has been criticized severely by his opponent, Ronald Reagan, for permitting the Russians to gain too much under the policy of détente.

There was no way to be sure whether the factors for war or peace would dominate, or whether some unforeseeable event would destroy carefully constructed plans.

Gently, a Junta Ousts Mrs. Peron

The name and power she acquired through marriage kept Isabel Martínez de Perón in office as Argentina's President for 20 months and 23 days, but last week the inevitable end, a military coup, occurred, and she is now under house arrest in a mountain retreat.

The nation is ruled by a junta formed by its three military chieftains, headed by Lieut. Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla, the army's leader. Without the Perón name, the Peronist movement is not likely to lead Argentina again soon, though perhaps as much as a third of the nation would call itself Peronist.

Bread and butter concerns finally led to disenchantment with the Peronist leadership. Inflation has been rising at a 335 percent annual rate. Workers, their purchasing power vanishing, have engaged in slowdowns that cut production by from 50 to 80 percent in important automotive and metal-processing plants. Tax collections, which the Government desperately needs to meet payrolls, have been crippled. One official said tax revenue supports only 5 percent of Government spending; the principal supply of Government funds has come simply from printing more pesos.

The economic chaos splintered the movement. Some Peronistas turned to violent, revolutionary action. Others waited for new leadership, but it never appeared. The military chiefs also waited weeks for Mrs. Perón to resign voluntarily and maintain at least a semblance of constitutional form. When they finally removed her in a surgical, peaceful takeover, they also imprisoned a large number of Government and Peronist officials.

The junta said it will stay in power three years, a situation not new in Argentina. Since 1930, the military has ruled directly or indirectly much of the time, regularly overthrowing elected regimes. When Juan Perón died in 1974, his widow and vice president—a dancer he had met in a Panamanian cafe—assumed his office and stayed longer than anyone anticipated.

Peronism was not so much a coherent system as a populist movement, known as Justicialismo, that provided rapid wage increases and other benefits to the workers, stimulated industries and nationalized the banks.

The military junta has already turned to economic advisers identified with private enterprise and orthodox liberal economic views. The Government is likely to seek to stimulate both private and foreign investment in the country and most observers expect Argentines are in for a period of austerity.

The Serious Flu

The Federal Government plans to immunize every person in the United States this fall against a flu virus that appeared last month in Fort Dix, N.J., and which seems similar to the virus involved in the 1918-19 world flu epidemic. At that time, an estimated 20 million persons, including 548,000 Americans, died.

It is the potential for disaster, however remote, that has induced President Ford, with scientists' concurrence and the almost certain approval of Congress, to propose a vaccination program unprecedented in scope and in so brief a time. The vaccine needed will cost $135 million.

The virus, which has been found only in the single outbreak in Fort Dix, appears to be similar to the virus that causes influenza in pigs, the so-called swine flu virus that is blamed for the world epidemic. There is no way of knowing whether the newly found virus is likely to behave like the 1918 virus.

To date only small experimental batches of vaccine against the new virus have been produced. From experience with other flu vaccines, health experts have no doubt that the new vaccine will work. If all goes well, inoculation of high-risk groups, such as persons with heart disease, could begin in late summer.

Latin America, the Growing Graveyard for Democracies

By JUAN de ONIS

BUENOS AIRES—A manual for the destruction of democracy could be written from the experience of the eight South American countries now under military rule.

David Burnett/Contact

In Uruguay and in Chile elaborate theories have been presented by right-wing ideologues for constitutional changes establishing "nationalist" authoritarian systems equally opposed to "liberal democracy" and "international Communism."

The prospects for a return to freely elected civilian governments in any of these countries, Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia, Chile, Peru or Ecuador, are remote and uncertain.

Argentina, which was under military rule from 1966 to 1973, rejoined the "military club" last week when the armed forces overthrew and arrested President Isabel Martinez de Perón.

Only Venezuela, the richest country on the continent with its oil income, and Colombia, despite urban and peasant unrest, have managed over the last 18 years to keep their elected civilian governments in office without interruption.

The deterioration and discredit of the political parties results from factors that range from electoral frauds to the irresponsibility of erratic leaders and, above all, factional splits and individual opportunism.

The Peruvian military seized power in 1962 after an election was rigged. The Argentine military twice overthrew elected Presidents, Arturo Frondizi in 1962 and Arturo Illia in 1966, after disputes over electoral deals with the Peronists, who were then outlawed.

The sudden resignation of President Jânio da Silva Quadros of Brazil, seven months after taking office and for no clear reason, and the erratic habits of President Carlos Julio Arosemena Monroy of Ecuador, an alcoholic, undermined the political movements they headed and inspired the military takeovers.

Factional disputes paralyzed cooperation between the Peruvian Congress and President Fernando Belaunde Terry before he was overthrown in 1968. A similar impasse between the Uruguayan Congress and President Juan Maria Bordaberry ended when Mr. Bordaberry and the military closed Congress, establishing a dictatorship in 1973.

President João Goulart was overthrown in 1964 by the Brazilian military, which is still in power 12 years later, after the break-up of the Social Democratic-Labor Party coalition that had kept Mr. Goulart's predecessor, Juscelino Kubitschek, in power for a full term.

President Salvador Allende Gossens' Government in Chile, overthrown by the military in 1973, was driven to a fatal impasse by the opposition in Congress to his socialist program and by the division betwen radicals and moderates in his Popular Unity coalition.

Because of the lack of political cohesion among democratic parties, it is commonplace for opposition groups to stimulate the military to seize power.

In Venezuela this has not been the case recently, although it was in the past. The two major parties, the Social Democratic Accion Democrática and the Christian Socialist Comité Organizador del Partido Electoral Independente, regularly alternate in power through free elections. In Columbia, a bipartisan system of alternating power was in effect until the last election, assuring balance in government. This system has now been abandoned with the Liberal Party in power.

Most South American countries have been trying for the last 30 years to develop their economies through a mixture of private investment, domestic and foreign and state investment in basic services and social security.

The Marxists, with socialism as the goal, have opposed this combination. Except in Chile, the Marxist parties have not been elected to power, but they have been strong in labor unions, the bureaucracy, and in universities. Nationalist sentiments are whipped up against foreign investments, often leading to restrictions, insecurity, and nationalization.

Legitimate social demands often drive weak governments into policies that discourage investment, generate deficits, and produce disastrous inflation. Revolutionary guerrilla movements have then appeared in almost all these countries.

The military, usually accustomed to intervening in politics, often think the system is working badly, too. They take over, as in Chile or Uruguay, with strongly repressive regimes using secret police and torture first against the underground guerrillas and eventually any opposition, or they take over as in Peru with social reform programs and nationalist economic plans that they believe will pre-empt the Marxist penetration.

In some cases, particularly in the overthrow of President Goulart in Brazil and of President Allende in Chile, the military were clearly encouraged by the United States Government, through the Central Intelligence Agency and military advisers, as well as North American business interests.

The authoritarian repressive nature of the military regimes in Brazil, Chile and Uruguay, which has become an issue in the United States Congress and academic circles, has generated some second though in the Ford Administration about the end results of these interventions.

But as Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's visit to Brazil indicated some weeks ago, the questions over democracy, and human rights don't seriously impair relations, and Mr. Kissinger said he plans to go to Chile in June for a meeting of American foreign ministers.

In Summary

Even Syria Has Little Control In Lebanon

The rapid disintegration of Lebanon, a multi-religious state once an island of stability in the Middle East, continues. Syria still appears to be the only party able to influence events, but even that country's leaders have been unable to stop the bloodshed or to impose a cease-fire.

Last week, for the first time, Kamal Jumblat, the Druse leader who heads the Progressive Socialist Party and who is the most powerful figure in the Moslem-leftist alliance in Lebanon, agreed to travel to Syria to discuss with President Hafez al-Assad the possibilities of a Syria-negotiated settlement.

This may remove a major obstacle in Syria's attempts to mediate. The Syrians have been unable to find a dominant personality in Lebanon on whom to focus their efforts.

Pierre Demayel, head of the Christian Phalangist Party, while calling on fellow Christians to take up arms, last week also expressed a renewed interest in Syria's arranging a negotiated cease-fire.

Still, any hope that a peaceful solution will be found soon is tempered by the ferocity of the feelings on both sides, by the complexity of the issues and by the delicate position in which the Syrian negotiators find themselves.

So the bloodletting continued last week. Hundreds more deaths were added to the estimated 10,000 previous fatalities in the 11-month civil war. In this latest outbreak of fighting, the Moslem-leftist alliance seems to have gained the upper hand.

President Suleyman Franjieh, the most prominent Christian leader, left, under fire, the hillside mansion where he had been resisting demands that he resign. He and other Christian leaders rallied for what could be a last stand in the town of Junieh, north of Beirut.

The Moslem-leftist forces were closing in and the most likely outcome seemed to be that the old Christian-dominated Lebanon would be no more. In its place there may be a new Moslem-dominated, more Arab state. The best evidence for that came from an armada of small ships that left Lebanon carrying Christian refugees to Cyprus. Lebanon, once the safe haven for the Middle East's refugees, now has become a source of refugees itself.

U.S. Uses the Veto for Israel

The United States has again vetoed a United Nations Security Council resolution critical of Israel, consistent with Washington's supportive policy for the Jewish state. But in the same proceeding, there was an important precedent for future negotiations on the Middle East: Israeli and Palestine Liberation Organization delegates participated face-to-face.

The American veto came on a resolution deploring Israeli policies in Jerusalem and in the occupied areas on the West Bank of the Jordan River. It had been preceded by a statement by the new United States Ambassador, William W. Scranton, which itself criticized the Israelis for settling in the disputed area.

But even though the resolution had been carefully tailored to try to enlist American support, in the end, Washington called for the veto. Despite the resolution's failure, the Palestinians claimed "a great victory for a great event." Fourteen Council members had voted in favor of the resolution.

Although Israel denied its policy towards dealing with the guerrillas had changed, it may now be difficult for the Israelis to prevent inclusion of the Palestinians in future Middle East negotiations. Until last week, the Israelis had insisted they would never sit down with representatives of the Palestinian Liberation Organization.

The West Bank Troubles

The debate had been inspired by the most sustained, violent and costly of all the disturbances on the West Bank since the area was captured by Israel in 1967. The rioting started over Jewish attempts to worship on Temple Mount, also one of Islam's holiest places, but grew to include protests over Israel's entire policy toward the area.

The Arabs have been angered by Israeli plans for settlements, which they see as the first step toward annexation. They have also been angonized by the rigorous Israeli occupation in which there have been frequent midnight searches of homes and long detentions of suspected troublemakers without formal trial.

The Arab successes in the 1973 war raised hopes among the West Bank Arabs that the Israeli occupation would soon end. The fact that it hasn't has frustrated their growing nationalism. And even though a measure of calm has been restored, the violence of the past few weeks seems to indicate the calm cannot last.

Agreement on Bases in Turkey

The United States and Turkey have agreed on a four-year accord that will permit the reopening of 26 American military installations in Turkey. Some of the installations are important to American intelligence-gathering on Turkey's northern neighbor, the Soviet Union. But the new accord must still be approved by Congress and although Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger has said Congress will "probably" concur it is far from certain that he is right.

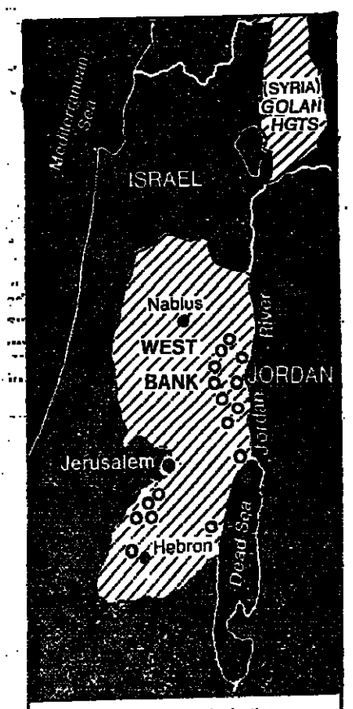
The new agreement on the installations was needed because Turkey last year terminated the old one in retaliation for a Congressional cutoff of arms aid. Several members of Congress have already said they will oppose the new treaty unless there is progress on Turkey's negotiations with Greece on the crisis in Cyprus. There has been no progress. All of this raises questions, now apparently unanswerable, as to why the Ford Administration has gone through the negotiations with Turkey knowing that Congressional response will in some fashion be tied to Turkey's progress in Cyprus. One possible answer is that Secretary Kissinger has received private assurances from Ihsan S. Caglayangil, the Turkish Foreign Minister, that concessions will be made soon on the Cyprus issue.

Italian Party's Cautious Vote

By re-electing as its leader Benigno Zaccagnini, who believes in seeking Communist support for specific measures in times of crisis, Italy's governing Christian Democratic Party has affirmed its policy of dealing cautiously with Communist attempts to assume a greater share of power.

Mr. Zaccagnini defeated a bid for the leadership by Defense Minister Arnaldo Forlani, who wanted to keep the Communists at a greater political distance. He is suspicious of their stated desire to seek power through the elective process and of their self-described independence of Moscow.

The election of Mr. Zaccagnini, and the implications of his election for relations with the Communists were the major business at the Christian Democratic congress that ended last week. The bitterness of the election emphasized the divided status of the Democrats but the party faces other difficulties.



French Make a New Atom Deal

France has agreed to build a nuclear power plant in Libya, similar to agreements it has made or is making with Iran and Iraq, again raising serious and familiar questions about nuclear proliferation.

French authorities say that the plant will be used solely for a water desalination project and that French technicians may operate it. The French insist they will not provide Libya with nuclear research facilities or the means to produce heavy water which could be used to manufacture atomic weapons.

But, because of the volatile nature of the Libyan regime, even an "innocent" nuclear deal creates apprehensions elsewhere in Europe and in North Africa.

The Storm in Jerusalem Revives a Dormant Issue

By NAOMI SHEPHERD

JERUSALEM—Recent unrest in occupied territories on the West Bank of the Jordan River has revived the historic and political debate on the status of Jerusalem and reminded Israel that its annexation of the eastern part of the city in 1967 has not been internationally sanctioned.

The key incident which started the disturbances was a ruling by a Jewish magistrate that Jewish youths arrested after demonstrative prayers on the Temple Mount had not committed a criminal act. The Mount is sacred both to Jews and to Moslems but Jewish religious tradition forbids access to the site. The incident revealed the extent to which nationalist and religious sentiments are linked in the Arab-Israel conflict and the fragility of any consensus on which control of the Holy City must depend.

Earlier in the century, Moslem and Jewish claims to the Temple Mount were not the central concern of the city's rulers. From the end of World War I until 1948, it was the status of the Christian holy places and their protection which took precedence in international debate on the custodianship of the city. The assumption was that neither Arabs nor Jews could control an area encompassing the sites sacred to Christendom. It Has Occasionally Been Tried, but a State of Siege Is More Norma

Democracy Failing in Colombia, Too

By TIMOTHY ROSS

BOGOTA, Colombia—When President Alfonso López Michelsen came to office in August, 1974, Colombia was, or at least seemed to be, a rare example of democracy resisting a continental trend toward autocracy. But a combination of factors has changed matters in Colombia since then, and now Latin America's fourth most populous nation now seems about to follow its neighbors on the road to outright authoritarianism.

Colombia was already experiencing social and economic difficulties when President López Michelsen took office, but he began his term promising to pursue democratic methods of improving his countrymen's lot. For example, he said that he would reimpose only as a last resort, the state of siege that had been in force almost continuously from 1948 until 1973. Under that modified form of martial law, the Government had wide powers of arbitrary arrest.

But the country's worsening economic situation provoked strikes, rioting, peasant land seizures and greatly increased guerrilla activity, even in the cities. The country's economy was severely disrupted, and the President reimposed the state of siege in June, 1975.

Rather than quelling the disturbances, the reimposition of the state of siege seems to have intensified them. They reached a peak of violence following the visit last month of Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, when students protesting his visit clashed with police and the military. Since then hundreds have been arrested and several students and workers have been killed.

Despite Colombia's tightly controlled economy, inflation is officially running at 18 percent annually. Unofficial estimates say it is as high as 25 percent. Officially, the unemployment rate is 10 percent, but in reality millions of Colombia's 24 million people are affectively outside the money economy. Hundreds of thousands of these unemployed have moved to the large cities of Bogotá, Medellin, Cali, Cartagena and Baranquilla.

There is also widespread disenchantment with the way the country is run; corruption is flagrant. High Colombian officials have been implicated in the Lockheed bribery scandals, and public knowledge of the clandestine activities of others is so widespread that one Cabinet member is sometimes referred to as "the Minister of Burials."

Ten days ago, the President signed crees, one establishing automatic se months' imprisonment, without trial, fenses as disturbing public order, r with the police, painting "offensive" gr or blocking traffic, and 12 months for crimes. The other decree fixes additi including suspension for a year, or public employees involved in strikes or slowdowns.

A crucial test will come April 18 in state elections. Some observers predi harassment of leftist candidates, the tration and resentment will be reflecte the radical parties at the expense Michelsen's Liberal Party and the Co servatives. Much of It Is a Matter of Keeping Up Appearances

France's Special Relationship With the Developing Nations

By FLORA LEWIS

PARIS—France's Finance Minister, Jean-Pierre Fourcade, offered gracious thanks for the honor when he was asked recently about France's apparent role as leader, or bridgehead, of the industrialized nations in their relations with the developing countries.

"It's kind," he continued, "but I really can't say we're the leaders. We participate in a large number of international efforts, the World Bank, the European Development Fund and so on. We are active, along with others."

That is very much the opinion of diplomats and officials of other countries. Nonetheless France has managed to spread the general impression that it does somehow occupy what French diplomacy calls "a privileged position," and that being host to the continuing North-South Conference on International Economic Affairs confirms its special status.

The appearance does tend to make up somewhat for the absence of hard fact.

Although he has made subtle shifts in French foreign policy, President Valery Giscard d'Estaing has conscientiously maintained the Gaullist stance of both "independence" and visible, if possibly spectacular, initiatives.

Mr. Giscard's predecessor, the late Georges Pompidou, proposed the "Euro-Arab Dialogue" in an effort to win favor from the oil-producing countries after the 1973 crisis. Mr. Giscard has sustained that effort by keeping France always a little ahead of its European partners in recognizing the Palestine Liberation Organization and by courting Arab leaders.

Two years later, the dialogue still is introductory, and France is paying the same price for oil as everybody else.

Mr. Giscard, broadening Mr. Pompidou's effort and following up on Mr. Pompidou's refusal to make France a member of the United States-sponsored International Energy Agency, proposed a trilateral conference which has now turned into the North-South dialogue. The original purpose was to counter the United States attempt to unify industrial countries to break up the oil carte, by offering instead what Mr. Giscard called "cooperation, not confrontation" among producers, industrial consumers, and consumers in the developing world.

It didn't work out that way because developing countries, with Algeria in the vanguard, refused to accept either the trilateral or consumer-producer format, and pushed through instead a line-up of industrial versus developing nations. France agreed quickly. The United States fought hard against the whole notion, then switched policies and gave in step by step.

A ranking American official who watched the whole procedure closely commented: "We would have been better off if we'd accepted the French 'dialogue' idea in the first place. Now we've got to face solidarity among not only the oil producers but all the other raw material countries as well."

France seemed to be developing a special hand-in-hand relation with Algeria as the nations that most often spoke for Europe and the developing nations, respectively. But France has lost that status now that the conference has begun its work. The slippage has been compounded by new troubles in French economic relations with Algeria, and Algerian fury with French support for Morocco in the dispute over the Western Sahara.

As Le Monde editorialized recently, the developing nations don't make it easy for President Giscard to apply his pledge of being everybody's friend. Sometimes, there is no choice but to make a choice that is bound to offend someone.

That is what happened with Angola, and it is the hidden reason for France's abrupt recognition of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola three days before the rest of the Common Market, despite standing Paris demands for a united European foreign policy.

According to other European diplomats, France picked its favorites in Africa long ago, and one of them was Zaire. Willy-nilly, that brought Paris to support the Angolan faction led by Holden Roberto, brother-in-law of Zaire's President Mobutu Sese Seko.

The Colonial Past

When the Popular Movement won and Mr. Roberto's group collapsed, Paris apparently thought it could make up for having picked the wrong side by an early-bird recognition. The diplomats doubt it will work, however. They say the Popular Movement took the French gesture "ironically" and may deliberately delay establishing diplomatic relations with Paris.

However, the colonial past, and the way in which France decolonized in black Africa, has left a tangible special French status there—warmly reinforced with cultural agreements and energetic support for the study and use of the French language.

The late President Charles de Gaulle set up a French union, an attempt to provide something like the British Commonwealth to keep the ex-colonies in the flock. It has buckled and broken, but there is a "franc-zone" which gets special economic aid and privileges from France, and language continues to afford a base for special bonds.

Last year, Mr. Giscard held a "French speaking African summit" meeting in the Central African Republic, a device that permitted inclusion of former Belgian colonies such as Zaire. But it is far from certain that the meeting, advertised as the first of a regular series, will be repeated.

Once burning political conflicts with countries in the industrial world are ended, developing countries tend to go for the hand that holds out development aid. France does make a special effort to accommodate former colonies.

Relations between the developing world and industrial countries are essentially about economics nowadays, and the French policy of facing up to this both in francs and in rhetoric has given France a favorable if not favored position before the developing states.

But basically, Mr. Fourcade is right. The needs are too big and too complex for any country to handle on its own. France's role is essentially a part of the many international programs.

The difference between what it is trying to do and what the United States does is more a matter of European-American, than French-American, contrast. Europe relies far more on the developing world for raw materials, especially energy, and for markets than does the United States. As a result, Europe is more sensitive to grievances of the developing nations and more eager to please.

However United States dependence is growing, and the patience od developing countries is fraying. The time may not be far off when further changes in American policy will wipe away the differences, and even the appearance of a "special position" for France.

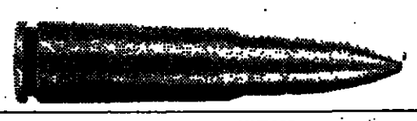
Johannesburg Has the Strongest Military Force

Southern Africa Equipped for All Kinds of War



By DREW MIDDLETON

If southern Africa drifts into war, the conflict will involve guerrillas, regular troops, mercenaries and armed civilians who are prepared for a conflict that is likely to range from helicopter-borne assaults to the single shot in the night through a farmhouse window.

Much of the speculation about the size and nature of a southern Africa war has been based on an assumption for which there is, at present little concrete evidence, namely that South Africa will ultimately intervene on the side of Rhodesia in a general war. But there is also the possibility that South Africa will stay out of a Rhodesia war against black Africa. There are also many nonmilitary complexities. For example, there is no assurance given their present economic troubles that all black African nations would participate in such a war. Nor do the mere numbers, with blacks far outnumbering whites in the area, reflect the military power of the various countries.

Yet, an assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the forces involved is hardly an academic exercise, given the tension in the area.

Rhodesia's ground and air forces have been fighting a sporadic war against black guerrillas, demanding control of a nation in which they outnumber whites 20 to 1, for more than a year. In that period the Rhodesian Government has raised force levels, assembled stocks of arms, ammunition and fuel and recast its defense plans.

Sixty percent of the Rhodesian forces are black, including two battalions of the Rhodesian African Rifles. Rhodesian officers say they have complete faith in the loyalty of their black soldiers, even in a war against other blacks. A third battalion of the Rhodesian African Rifles is being raised.

Blacks make up a sizable proportion of the 8,000-member British South African Police, which is neither British nor South African but a national police force in Rhodesia trained for paramilitary duties. In the current operations Police Anti-Terrorist Units, small mixed detachments of European and African policemen, have been employed effectively in counter-insurgency operations. Rhodesia's regular army is only 4,500 strong. But it is backed by 10,000 territorials, corresponding to the American National Guard, and 35,000 reservists.

In the guerrilla war that is now expanding along Rhodesia's frontiers, mobility for defending ground forces and instant reaction strikes by the 1,200-man air force are essential. Rhodesia's capabilities are minimal in both respects. The air force's combat aircraft are elderly British light bombers and fighters. The transport command includes only one squadron of helicopters, 16 French-built Alouette III's. This is an agile, serviceable aircraft but it is not large enough for rapid reinforcement of threatened areas by air.

The Rhodesian forces have attracted an apparently small number of mercenaries in the last 18 months, British, Portugese, South African and Germans. The expectation is that the number will rise should the fighting intensify. The Government denies that these foreigners can be called mercenaries because they must meet all the requirements demanded of native Rhodesians.

The Rhodesian military problem is somewhat analogous to that encountered by the Americans and their allies in South Vietnam. The Rhodesians' problem is the control of guerrilla movement across approximately 700 miles of the Zambian and Mozambican frontiers. Linear defense is out of the question: The Rhodesians do not have sufficient forces and, even if they did, static defensive lines have been ineffective elsewhere in combating insurgencies.

The tactics now being followed are the concentration of reaction forces at sites back of the frontier and the deployment of these forces, usually by truck but sometimes by air, to meet any sizable guerrilla infiltration.

Analysts caution that the analogy with Vietnam should not be carried too far. They are inclined to accept the Rhodesian view that morale of their troops, black as well as white, is high.

The Rhodesian Government is thought to be hoping for military support from South Africa if there is an all-out war. The reasons are clear.

South Africa's forces are generally regarded as the strongest in all Africa. The army numbers 38,000, the air force 8,000 and the navy 4,000. These forces are supported by 138,000 reservists and 75,000 civilian "commandos," a home guard.

The air force with its French Mirage fighters and British light bombers would dominate any battlefield, under present force levels in Southern Africa. There are five helicopter squadrons and four fixed wing transport squadrons.

The South African ground forces's armament includes modern armored cars, armored personnel carriers and some British Centurion tanks. The Rhodesian and South African forces would be superior in armaments, training and experience to the black guerrillas. But given the character of the terrain and the unsettling effect of hit and run tactics, the guerrilla threat, as it is today, remains a formidable one.

The accepted estimate is that there are more than 13,000 Rhodesian guerrillas with about 4,000 fully trained. About 1,000 are believed to be operating in Rhodesia. There are said to be about 1,200 just across the Mozambique border and another 800 on the Zambian frontier.

Their arms are mostly of Soviet or Chinese manufacture. They include the Simonov semiautomatic carbine, a Russian-made light machine gun and the A.K. assault rifle, the principal shoulder weapon of the Russian Army.

Rhodesian forces also have captured Soviet-made hand grenades, lightweight sub-machine guns like those used by the Vietcong, and light anti-tank weapons produced in both China and the Soviet Union. The T.N.T. slabs used in mines by the guerrillas are of Soviet origin. The guerrillas are regarded as well armed for the character of the war they are now waging.

Mozambique, from which most of the guerrillas are deployed, is dependent on Soviet arms shipments and some old weapons left behind when the Portugese departed. There are reports that the country has raised an army of approximately 5,000 which is poorly equipped, lacks mobility and is relatively untrained. According to Portugese sources the best armed body in the country is he national police. Zambia on Rhodesia's northwest frontier is in little better situation. The Zambian Army numbers 5,000 men and lacks tanks. There are only 24 combat aircraft in the air force, all of them old.

The conclusion drawn by military analysts here and abroad is that if the Rhodesians succeed in stifling the insurrection at its present level, the other black republics will have to intervene with such forces and arms as they have. Even this intervention, the sources thought, might prove insufficient to destroy the Rhodesian state. Further escalation might then bring in Cuban or other outside intervention. Then, according to this scenario, South Africa will have to decide whether to enter on the side of the Rhodesians, to withhold its troops while providing weapons and other aid or to remain uninvolved. If South African troops entered, most Western observers feel, the odds would be heavily in favor of the two white dominated countries.

Adams Wants to Spend More Than Ford Does

The chairman of the House Budget Committee has proposed that the Federal Government spend more next year than President Ford wants it to, but less than many House Democrats, including some members of the committee itself, wish. The chairman's recommendations rather than Mr. Ford's request are expected to give Congress's debate over spending its shape.

That is because of Congress's new budget machinery, designed to help the legislators make sounder spending and taxing decisions. House and Senate budget committees are now required to propose overall expenditures and revenue targets that both House must approve by Oct. 15, and after that to police Congress to help insure the targets are held to.

This year's postrecession budget-making is also complicated by philosophical and political differences that have been exacerbated by the Presidential election. Mr. Ford's aim, as President and as candidate, is Republican-conservative: to hold down Federal spending. His intention is to allow private rather than public spending to stimulate the economy. Many members of the Democratic majority in Congress disagree, particularly with Mr. Ford's proposals to curtail social spending. But they do not want to be accused of budget-busting either.

What the Budget Committee chairman, Representative Brock Adams of Washington, has proposed is an increase in the $394.2 billion Mr. Ford first requested for the 1977 fiscal year to $412.8 billion. The $18.6 billion increase, Mr. Adams maintains, is cessary for three reasons. The first is to assure that restrictive budget policies do not "arrest the beginning of economic recovery." The second is to assure "realistic budgeting." The White House, Mr. Adams said, underestimated spending totals by $7 billion. The third is to put adequate emphasis on human resource programs. Mr. Adams would spend $1.5 billion less on defense next year, and reduce new budget authority for future military spending by $7.2 billion.

The Administration adjusted the President's request to $395.8 billion, but said that was coincidental. Accusing Mr. Adams and other Democrats of having "forgotten the history" of world wars, the President said he will not accept the military cuts.

Some Decisions For Miss Hearst

Patricia Hearst, convicted of bank robbery and an associated weapons charge, faces a possible maximum of 25 years in prison when she is sentenced. The severity of her sentence may depend in large part on her cooperation with Federal and California authorities in a number of potential cases against her former associates. Whether she will aid the prosecutors is unknown.

She could help Federal agents who are investigating possible charges against writer Jack Scott and his wife and parents for allegedly harboring her while she was a fugitive in 1974. At her trial, she gave the first evidence that William and Emily Harris of the self-styled Symbionese Liberation Army may have been involved in the bank robbery.

Federal authorities in Sacramento may wish to discuss her knowledge of a bank robbery near there in April, 1975, for which Stephen Soliah, who was living with her and Wendy Yoshimura when they were arrested last September, is now on trial.

Miss Hearst herself still faces a state trial in Los Angeles for kidnapping and armed robbery. She is charged jointly with the Harrises in events that happened on May 16 and 17, 1974, when, allegedly, she fired a machine gun to help rescue them from being seized for shoplifting.

Several of the jurors who convicted Miss Hearst in the bank robbery agreed last week that key evidence against her included a tape made after her arrest, in which she spoke of how angry she was when captured; the "monkey" charm, given her by S.L.A. member Willie Wolfe, which she carried until her arrest and which the prosecution first learned about from the Harrises; and her taking the Fifth Amendment.

The Campaign: Nixon's Report

President Ford has read and returned to former President Nixon a 60-page report on Mr. Nixon's recent trip to China. Though the document, in duplicate, reached the White House the weekend of March 13, that fact was not disclosed until last Monday.

Mr. Nixon's journey was an embarrassment to Mr. Ford's New Hampshire campaign, and presumably the White House did not want the report to become one as well. Mr. Ford and his aides have stressed that Mr. Nixon traveled to China as private citizen and not as a representative of the Ford Administration.

Election Board Saga

As had been expected, Congress failed to restructure the Federal Election Commission by the deadline set by the United States Supreme Court. One result has been that payment of Federal matching subsidies to candidates who qualify for them was stopped. Another has been agreement in the Senate on a compromise bill that would resuscitate the commission.

But that bill must now go to the House of Representatives. There, more disagreement and consequently more delay is expected. Reconciliation of party differences on spending and publicity by corporate and union political action committees made passage of the Senate measure possible. In the House, critics of the commission have attached amendments that limit the panel's powers to impose and enforce campaign ground rules.

All that was needed to meet the Supreme Court's ruling was a simple bill that provided the panel's members be appointed by the executive branch. The President has said he would veto any other, though his decision may change depending on the bill that passes.

I.R.S. Is Looking At the Bribers

The commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service says that the tax agency has expanded its investigations into the payoff practices of American companies at home and abroad, and that legal action may be taken "soon" against one or more corporations.

Under American law, bribing American officials is a crime. Bribing the officials of other governments is not, but it is illegal for American companies, or people who work for them, to deduct such payments as legitimate business expenses and so reduce the amount of tax they owe the United States.

Primaries: There Must Be a Much Better Way

By R. W. APPLE Jr.

WASHINGTON—Phase one of this primary season has ended, and whatever else it has done, it has convinced many of those who have trudged from New Hampshire to Vermont and Massachusetts to Florida to Illinois to North Carolina that the system must have been designed by a madman.

With 24 primaries still to go, the pace will get worse, not better. Senator Walter F. Mondale, Democrat of Minnesota, yesterday described the present system of nominating Presidential candidates as "something close to anarchy." One of those seeking the nomination called it "exhausting, fragmented, irrational, superficial and ridiculously expensive."

The schedule itself seems to make no sense. The most common complaint voiced at least since 1952, has been directed toward New Hampshire, which always votes first. The state is atypical, the critics cry; who chose it for the most influential position on the electoral calendar?

But that problem is not so severe as other aspects of the schedule. Can there be any justification for holding primaries in three important states—in indeed, three of the ten largest, California, Ohio and New Jersey—on the same day? No candidate can hope to put himself before three electorates spread across 3,000 miles, in any coherent way, especially since there are other primaries the week before.

Can there be any justification for holding six primaries on the same day? Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming, Kentucky, Tennessee and Arkansas all vote on May 25, making it certain that some of the states will get no more than a glimpse of the candidates as they climb out of their airplanes, speak a few words and climb back.

The technical anomalies are almost boundless. The worst of all, New York's law forbidding the listing of the candidates' names on the ballot, has been eased, but only for the Democrats and only for this one year, and the party leaders who think they thrive on voter ignorance may insist on the reimposition of the old system in 1980 or 1984.

Consider the matter of allocating delegates from a given state. The winner of the June 8 Republican balloting in California—even if he gets only one vote more than the runner-up—gets all 167 of the state's Republican convention delegates. But the Democratic winner must share delegates on a proportional basis with the runner-ups. Thus, unless the extraordinarily popular young Governor, Edmund G. Brown Jr., can collect something approaching 75 percent of the vote and his rivals split the rest, he will be unable to command a solid bloc of delegates.

The inconsistencies are further demonstrated by a comparison of the Illinois and North Carolina results this month. Illinois has two elections—a preferential "beauty contest," which doesn't count except in a psychological sense, and the elections for delegates. In that state, a candidate who did not even enter the "beauty contest," Senator Adlai E. Stevenson 3rd won the most Democratic delegates, 85. And Ronald Reagan, former governor of California with 40 percent of the popular vote, won only 13 of the 96 Republican delegates, or 13.5 percent.

In North Carolina there is only one election, and President Ford, with 46 percent of the total vote, got 25 of the 54 delegates, which amounts to 46 percent.

The differences between the states are so large that the nation can be said to have 50 different systems of selecting delegates. They result from the fact that no national nominating system has ever been established.

The system as it now stands gives obvious benefits to the outsider, such as former Governor Jimmy Carter of Georgia, because it begins in New Hampshire a state small enough that a political unknown can make himself known. As it happens, the early Florida primary was also a boon to the Georgian, because it allowed him to establish himself as a giant-killer in the third week by defeating Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama.

Few theoreticians would like to to the system of the 1950's and which most states chose their delegat cized and ill-attended caucuses and s the power of choice to the Governor.

Only 14 Cases Have Been Tried Under the 1974 Law

A Tempest Over U.S. 'Protectionism'

By EDWIN L. DALE Jr.

WASHINGTON—United States imports of a product called "specialty steel," stainless and other high-alloy steels, amounted to $200 million last year, or two-tenths of one percent of the country's annual imports of $100 billion of things that range from raw materials to finished automobiles.

The small American specialty steel industry employs about 40,000 workers, a tiny portion of the nation's 90-million labor force. About a quarter of these workers were out of work last year, at least in part because of imports.

The industry's troubles seem very small potatoes. Yet decisions in Washington arising from those troubles have aroused all the old visceral instincts, at home and abroad, in the recently quiecent debate over "free trade" versus "protectionism."

The reason the debate has revived is that the decision will lead to modest restriction of specialty steel imports. Even allowing for the few similar cases currently pending, including one important one involving nonrubber footwear, the emotions seem exaggerated.

The occasion for the cases is the Trade Act of 1974, the first revision of United States trade law in 12 years. The act was a complicated mix of provisions that open the way for lower United States barriers to imports and provisions that provide more assured "relief" against import competition.

The "free trade" part of the law had its first concrete manifestations last week, when the United States made a broad proposal at the slow-moving international trade negotiations in Geneva for global reductions of tariffs, including American tariffs, by up to 60 percent.

The other part of the 1974 act led to the specialty steel and shoe cases and to the current wave of agitation. It comes partly from U.S. "free traders," but even more from foreign countries fearing United States import restrictions.

The new trade law actually has four separate provisions that make new restraints on imports possible. The steel and shoe cases arose under one of them, called the "escape clause." The law made it substantially easier for a domestic industry to prove injury from imports than under the escape clause of previous law.

A decision on injury, and a recommendation for relief if injury is found, is made by the six-member, quasi-judicial, International Trade Commission. If the President rejects or modifies a commission recommendation following a finding of injury Congress can override his decision within 90 days. If that should happen, the commission recommendation takes effect.

The speciality steel and shoe cases are two of only 14 cases that have been filed under the new law. Four minor ones are still awaiting the commission's decision. In most of the others, the commission has found no injury, a clear indication that it is not "institutionally protectionist." But in the specialty steel case, it found injury and recommended a system of import quotas, by product and by country, that would cut back the recent level of imports by 10 per cent.

President Ford, in his first major trade decision—and one in which he was essentially in a no-win position—delayed quotas pending an effort to negotiate an international "orderly marketing agreement" for specialty steel among the main producing nations. Such an agreement would have much the same effect as the quotas.

The shoe industry is not only of much greater importance to consumers. It also has more domestic plants and workers. In the case commission unanimously found in not muster a majority for any spe President must decide next month.

Under the other three potentially parts of the 1974 law, only one arisen. It is, however, a whopper union (though not the industry) ha foreign cars are being sold in the at "dumping" prices, that is, at lov in the home markets. The Treasu the initial finding in this case, annual imports of $7.5 billion.

Even if the Treasury finds dumpi tional Trade Commission must then of injury to the domestic industry dumping duties can be imposed. auto sales up and the import share such a determination seems unlikely.

But, with metro-y, virtually every unionized group from agel bakers wound up settling for a wage ents an hour, a pattern originally fixed as House intervention in steel.

mber is likely to emerge from this year's is not only because chronic inflation has sharply increased labor's concept of how much is enough but, even more, because of the interunion dislocations caused by the uneven spread of cost-of-living escalators in the three decades since World War II.

These clauses, aimed at shielding pay envelopes against the bite of inflation, now cover 7.7 million workers. Some unions, such as the United Auto Workers, have escalators with no ceiling. Others, including the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, have escalators that provide limited protection against higher living costs. Still others, among them the United Rubber Workers, have no escalators at all. In a three-year bargaining cycle during which consumer prices rose by more than 30 percent after contracts were signed, the presence or absence of an escalator can make the difference between a worker with money in the bank and one sinking into debt.

Up Go the Escalators

The auto union's escalator has put an extra $1.05 an hour into its members' earnings on top of the basic 60 cents in increases guaranteed by their 1973 pact. Those figures do not include 9 cents more diverted to bolster union benefit funds in the period of maximum unemployment. But the teamsters, who did 35 cents an hour better than auto on their fixed increases, got only 22 cents under their capped escalator. The combined total of $1.17 an hour more since their last agreement left them 38 cents behind the motor makers. The gap is even bigger in rubber, where there have been no escalator add-ons to the basic increases of 67 to 81 cents an hour the tire unionists won through a chaotic 1973 season at the bargaining table and on the picket line.

Not surprisingly, pressure for full cost-of-living escalators has moved to front rank in the union "must" list in both trucking and rubber. But the teamster negotiations are even further complicated by the approach of the giant union's convention in Las Vegas in June. Its president, Frank E. Fitzsimmons will be running for a new five-year term, and is under attack from dissident members on grounds ranging from "sellout tactics" at the negotiating table to alleged complicity in the disappearance of his predecessor, James R. Hoffa.

To demonstrate his respect for union democracy, Mr. Fitzsimmons summoned 700 local delegates to Arlington Heights, Ill., last week for a report on the pay talks. When the call went out several weeks ago, the union had every expectation it would have an acceptable contract to put before the members and thus strengthen the Fitzsimmons re-election bid. But the employers, anxious about putting their best offer on the table a full week before the contract deadline, came up with so little, that leadership itself recommended the taking of strike votes in all locals.

All that means much flexing of muscles before Wednesday. But even among Mr. Fitzsimmons' foes there is a private admission that enthusiasm for a strike is not high among the rank and file.

The best guess among close observers is that the teamsters will get a settlement that boosts first-year labor costs by 9 to 11 percent, and an unlimited escalator in addition. Such an outcome would not pain the Administration's inflation-watchers, even though it would be well above the 5.5 percent standard set by President Nixon's Pay Board during his on-again, off-again experiment in controls. As one Administration economist put it: "In a catch-up year, when workers are trying to recover lost purchasing power, we have to reconcile ourselves to something around 10 percent."

No such increases are in prospect, however, for another group of workers moving toward a Wednesday midnight strike deadline. They are the 40,000 public employees on New York City's municipal subways and buses.

Both Mayor Beame and Governor Carey have warned that the city and the state's fiscal crises mean there is no money for higher pay or benefits for any city workers. What happens to wages for New York's police, firemen and 200,000 other civil servants rides on transit union. It gave the whole city pay structure its sharpest upward shove with a 12-day strike in 1966.

This time an escalator clause written into the subway contract two years ago may prove the key to keeping the trains running. Both sides are looking to it as a way around the pay freeze.

One Man's Family

Daniel J. Evans, the Governor of the state of Washington, will not seek a fourth term. He says he is leaving political life because "I love my family more." Governor Evans has a reputation as a political maverick, originally earned when he ran for Governor on the Republican ticket in 1964 and won by disassociating himself from the campaign of the party's Presidential nominee, Barry Goldwater. Mr. Evans nonetheless served as keynote speaker at the 1968 Republican national convention. Last January President Ford named him one of eight "qualified" potential running mates, but Governor Evans says he will probably not make himself available as a Vice-Presidential candidate.

Choice in Westminster

The new head of the Roman Catholic Church of England and Wales is Abbot Basil Hume, a Benedictine monk. He was installed as the Archbishop of Westminster, and thus became spiritual head of 4.1 million Catholics in England and Wales. The new archbishop is expected to be elevated to the rank of cardinal later this year. He said he would involve himself in solving the "problem of how we communicate the Gospel to the modern world."

Infernal Triangle

New York State's top Medicaid official, Beverlee A. Myers, has resigned charging that the $3.5 billion program is both mismanaged and ineffective. Mrs. Myers said that the fiscal crisis had resulted in decisions made to cut down on state spending rather than to make programs more effective. "I am naming the division of the budget as co-respondent in my divorce from the State of New York," she said. Management of the Medicaid program is particularly unwieldy because many of the programs it finances are divided up among different agencies; spending decisions have often been prefaced with much bureaucratic infighting, resulting, said Mrs. Myers, in "special interest groups" playing one agency off against another.

"Politics in 1976 must be based on a tough mind and a tender heart..."

"...on a foundation of sound values and a sensitive, loving spirit. I have sensed this in Jimmy Carter."

That's what Congressman Andrew Young, former aide to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., said early this year. Since then, many thousands of Americans have shown thay they share that opinion.

It's a remarkable record.

Jimmy Carter has finished first in nine of the first twelve state primaries and caucuses.

Remarkable because of the diversity of his support. From Iowa to New Hampshire, from Florida to Illinois, surveys indicate that his appeal is evenly balanced across all demographic and ideological groupings. In the important Florida primary — important because he soundly defeated George Wallace — he drew votes in equal proportions from professional and blue-collar workers. This included 70% of the black vote and 60% of those who had voted for George McGovern in the 1972 primary.

Remarkable too because he has done it all with no help from political bosses, kingmakers and Washington insiders. The only thing going for him is his record of honesty, efficiency and compassion, a record of enormous appeal to voters who find such qualities in short supply.

As Governor of Georgia, Jimmy Carter streamlined the government, cutting the number of state agencies from 300-plus to 22. In what seems like a minor miracle in these economic times, he managed to increase services, while leaving a surplus of $116 million in the state's treasury.

While describing Jimmy Carter as one of the finest governors in Georgia's history, Martin Luther King Sr. went on to say, "I have never met a finer person."
So strong is his quiet appeal that the Gallup Poll headlined on March 15: "Jimmy Carter is the only Democrat who can beat Gerald Ford."

Why? Because people trust him when he says that he is for job opportunities for all Americans, for the disclosure of business and financial involvements of public officials, for openness in public affairs both foreign and domestic, for the assignment of revenue-sharing funds directly to local cities and communities, and for the cities to be relieved of welfare costs.

With all of this, perhaps it is not so remarkable that Jimmy Carter is the most exciting and successful figure on the political scene. But his campaign has reached a crucial stage. Viewing the primary system as the essence of democracy, Jimmy Carter is the only candidate to campaign in all 50 states, a grueling and expensive process.

To continue his fight, he urgently needs financial help from all who want to see strength and responsiveness and compassion restored to our national character. Who have had enough of divisiveness and easy cynicism, who want to believe again.

What about you? Won't you help Jimmy Carter now, when it means so much? Vote for him in the New York primary on April 6 — but first, fill in the coupon below and return it with your contribution. Today.

Beame Asserting His Right to Be The Hatchet Man

The tenor of the relationship between New York City and its financial overseers, Governor Carey and the state-dominated Emergency Financial Control Board, has changed perceptibly. The city is trying to play a more aggressive role than it has been in determining its own future. However the relationship alters, for both sides the task remains the same: to cope with the fact of the city's poor financial condition by cutting back the services and amenities residents have come to depend on.

As part of his latest, $821 million budget-cutting plan announced last week, Mayor Beame said it is up to the state and Federal governments to do more to help the city.

The Mayor asked the state to assume $127 million in court, probation and correction costs. Refusal, the Mayor said, would mean a new wave of layoffs, with the implied threat of economic and political repercussions for the state as well as the city.

And he said he still intended to end the city's voluntary annual subsidy of the City University's senior colleges, saving $140 million. This puts the onus on the state, which is responsible for higher education, to come up with the money or pay the price in hurting the university.

Also figured into the program was $55 million in hoped-for Federal housing subsidies and an estimated $43 million in savings from the city's planned withdrawal in two years from the Social Security System. The city announced its intention last week, saying a private insurance plan would be substituted. Whether an alternative plan would in fact be cheaper, or the projected savings be realized, or even whether the city will really pull out, is moot.

Most of the proposed cuts would come from the city itself. Eight thousand more jobs would be eliminated. But if present high attrition rates continue, only a few hundred persons would be dismissed. This contrasts with the 2,500 layoffs, among 44,000 job closings, made since early 1975.

The cutback would affect the police department, welfare, drug and environmental agencies, the Health and Hospitals Corporation, the schools and City University system, libraries, museums, ferry service, garbage collections.

Governor Carey's reaction to the Beame budget was conciliatory. He apparently found the plan at least acceptable enough to be negotiable.

The chastened municipal unions predictably expressed anger at the Beame plan, but, significantly, did not mention the word "strike."

The idea is not remote though, in the case of the Transport Workers Union, which is engaged in negotiating a new contract. The 34,000 members want more money; the Transit Authority says there is none. But the union is considering accepting a deferred pay increase, in return for a cost-of-living adjustment. If the sides cannot agree on a contract, which also must be approved by the Control Board, a shutdown of the entire bus and subway system on Thursday seems likely.

Just Who Visits the Metropolitan Museum

The Metropolitan Museum of Art, a cultural mainstay for New York City residents, is a formidable tourist attraction as well. According to a recent survey by an opinion research firm, half of the 85,000 people who visit the Metropolitan weekly are from outside the city's five boroughs. These visitors are about equally divided between those from New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, and those from the rest of the United States or abroad.

Emerging from the museum study is a portrait of the out-of-town tourist as adult, family-oriented, educated, and affluent, with a family income of $20,000 or more.

According to the New York Convention and Visitors' Bureau, the Metropolitan is frequented by more tourists annually than most other city attractions, such as the Statue of Liberty, the Empire State Building and the United Nations. Only Rockefeller Center has more visitors than the museum.

The museum, received $2.6 million in subsidies from New York City this year, but faces a 5 percent cutback in the next budget. The survey was taken to bolster the museum's claim to public financial support.

City U. Plan Hurts Minorities

New York City and the Emergency Financial Control Board have been trying unsucessfully for months to get the City University to submit a firm budget-cutting program. Action by the university has been slow because at first it underestimated the extent of the problem, then stalled, many believe, in the hope that additional funds would be found.

Last week, in exasperation, state and city officials decided to set up a special panel to study the university's problems and try to accelerate the spending cuts.

The education board did come up with a program last week, but it was offered only as a "consensus" of the 10-member panel, an informal statement that would permit the board to have bargaining flexibility with the Control Board. Government officials were said to be unhappy with this approach. Presumably, the special city panel will now examine this program.

Under the proposal, which the education board said would save about $60 million in a budget already cut from $552 million to $401 million, minority students would be most affected. The following changes would take place:

Richmond College, a two-year school restricted to juniors and seniors, would be merged with Staten Island Community College; Hostos Community College would be merged with Bronx Community College; Medgar Evers would be reduced from a four-year to a two-year school. No decision was included on whether to close John Jay College or to keep it as a separate but smaller school specializing in criminal justice. In addition, new admissions standards would limit immediate elegibility.

The minorities are affected chiefly because of the proposal to reduce the status of Hostos and Medgar Evers; the percentage of minorities in the student body at Medgar Evers is 96.2 and at Hostos, 96.0. The board said it felt that Hostos students could be served by Bronx Community College. The decision to reduce the status of Medgar Evers was based on the belief that the stiffer admissions program would seriously reduce the enrollment at the four-year school.

Tuition Going Up

The State University of New York has raised tuition for 145,000 students, but in most cases those from low-income families will not be affected. As a result of student aid about 23,000 students will to pay no tuition and 57,0 will not have to pay the months of the crisis the city and state ntered into an uneasy hich everyone knew alled a new era in nance. Out of the ne Municipal Assist- on, a rickety mecha- d its task of winning of the nation's inves- ng the cash-starved nder. Then the part- nership was subsumed in the scramble for Federal aid for the city.

Now it has resumed, a stronger alliance than ever. Of all effects of the fiscal crisis on governmental operations, perhaps the most remarkable is the new working relationship between the state and the banks. Not since the Depression has the private investment community had so critical a voice—and stake—in the daily workings of government.

For months their main concern has been two crucial enterprises to resolve the overall emergency: the assembling of a $2.6 billion rescue package to refinance the faltering state construction agencies, and the state's drive to borrow $4 billion in the spring for its own operations and for the huge seasonal aid payments to cities, counties and school districts. Both partners have recognized that, if the state were to fail in either attempt, the banks, whose portfolios are bulging with state and state-agency securities, would be among those hurt most. And yet in both cases the New York City banks have resources to provide only a portion of the financing the state needs.

Most significant about the state-banks relationship has been their combined effort to enlist other sources of financing to help the beleaguered state. Together they put pressure on the reluctant state comptroller, Arthur Levitt, to use pension-fund assets to help bail out the Housing Finance Agency and its sister agencies. Together they sought to persuade the Federal Government to grant mortgage insurance for state-financed and city-financed middle-income housing projects under the Mitchell-Lama program. And now, in an alliance of power and influence that will be tested in coming weeks, they will try to persuade the nation's 50 largest banks, as well as many corporations, to buy state notes for their own portfolios to insure that spring-borrowing needs are met on time.

"The banks and the state know they don't always have identical interests," said one high-level aide to Governor Carey recently. "But what's different from a year ago is that they have now all co-opted each other.

They know they are all in the same canoe, and you don't start shoving the other guy around or the canoe will tip over."

To many the banks' influence on state policies was demonstrated most dramatically during the special legislative session late last year, when Ellmore C. Patterson, chairman of the Morgan Guaranty Trust Company, marched out of a late-night meeting with Governor Carey and demanded that the Legislature enact new taxes immediately to balance the state budget. In the last two months, the power of the banks was invoked constantly by the Governor to justify the need for an additional $600 million in unpopular spending cuts to achieve the same purpose. The cuts were necessitated by Mr. Carey's and the banks' realization that no out-of-state investors would consider helping New York with this year's seasonal borrowing without evidence that state expenditures and revenues would be reasonably in sync.

More recently the partnership has been working on the prospectus for the spring borrowing, in which the state, at the banks' urging, is pledging explicitly that any future increases in spending be matched by revenues and that the legislative leaders are not contemplating another moratorium like that imposed last year on the payment of maturing New York City notes.

A Change of Status

Why is the state so eager to cooperate with the demands of the New York City banks? The main reason probably is related to the new status of the banks themselves. The state knows that the banks are undergoing the most rigorous scrutiny they have had in a generation. The extent of all their shaky loans and investments—to real estate investment trusts, to bankrupt corporations and underdeveloped countries, not to mention New York City itself—have been fully and embarrassingly disclosed. The state knows further that the banks are no longer perceived around the country as independent financial giants. Rather they are perceived as institutions so inextricably tied to the crises of New York State and City that they are forced to take unusual risks to ameliorate the situation.

An unusual byproduct of the new relationship is the strategy the partnership has adopted to meet the state's financing requirements. First the 11 major commercial banks in New York City, members of the Clearing House Association, agreed to purchase $1 billion in state notes for their own portfolios. The state and the banks have also worked together to enlist the tacit support of the Federal Reserve System as part of the effort to get out-of-state investors to take their share.

Equally interesting is the new tactic of quiet persuasion: The state and the banks will attempt to get the out-of-state banks to purchase state notes in a strategy of "private placements" that contrasts sharply with the nationwide publicity and "road shows" that attended the sales of Municipal Assistance Corporation bonds last summer.

"We are not official agents or underwriters for the state in this," one New York banker said last week. "The banks are nonetheless playing their role of good public citizens with a vital interest in assisting New York State."

"Actually, the state and the banks were always dependent on each other," a state fiscal aide said. "It is just that these things never take shape in the public eye until times are tough for all concerned."

Where We Stand
by Albert Shanker President, United Federation of Teachers

Albany to Decide This Week

Will New York City Schools Live or Die?

This is the week the New York State Legislature will decide whether New York City schools are to live or die . . . whether the city's 1.1 million public school children are to have an education roughly comparable to that given all their predecessors and all their contemporaries elsewhere in the state and the country . . . or whether the children are to pay for the fiscal sins of their political fathers in New York, Albany and Washington, D.C.

Sometime this week, unless an acceptable alternative is proposed by Governor Carey and Mayor Beame, the Legislature will decide whether to override the Governor's veto of the Stavisky-Goodman Bill. The original vote on the bill was 126 to 10 in the Assembly and 37 to 15 in the State Senate. Prospects are good for the first override of a New York gubernatorial veto in a century.

Why are the prospects good? One reason is the enormously broad coalition of teachers, parents, administrators and other concerned New Yorkers who urged their representatives to vote for the bill the first time around and are urging them now to stand fast in their commitment to the schools and the children of New York City. People who are not only on opposite sides of the negotiating table but too often on opposite sides of the fence when it comes to educational issues support the Stavisky-Goodman Bill because they know that without it, there can be nothing resembling education for their children. And without a viable system of public education, the city cannot survive. The president of the United Parents Associations of New York put it bluntly at a news conference last Sunday. He said that if New York City was concerned about its future, it should recognize that "its future is sitting right there in the classroom."

This broad and powerful coalition for aid to schools in their desperate straits includes: the United Federation of Teachers (UFT) and the New York State United Teachers (NYSUT), the UPA and the New York State Congress of Parents and Teachers, the New York City Board of Education and State Education Commissioner Ewald B. Nyquist, the Association of New York City Community School Boards, the Association of Community Superintendents and the Council of Supervisors and Administrators. It includes the New York State AFL-CIO. It includes civil rights groups concerned with neighborhood stabilization who know that the disappearance of decent schools can destroy a community even faster than blockbusters.

There are other people and other groups supporting the bill. Some of them have pointed out the connection between saving our schools and retaining a business community in New York, along with the jobs and taxes it provides. Early in February, Arthur Barnes, president of the New York Urban Coalition, wrote to Governor Carey urging him to sign the bill. Mr. Barnes said: "I am told time and again by the businessmen who support the Coalition that a major reason for business leaving the City is the lack of stability and quality in our public schools. This is cited as a major underlying reason for the difficulty in recruiting and keeping management personnel, and finding competent clerical staffs in New York City."

The Urban Coalition's warning—unheeded by the Governor—was dramatically, and sadly, illustrated last week when Union Carbide announced its decision to leave New York City for Danbury, Conn. A company source said Union Carbide had "difficulty" recruiting younger executives for work in the New York City headquarters because, among other reasons, "the schools aren't great." Union Carbide employs some 3,300 people and is said to provide employment for another 3,000 through its suppliers. In interviews, many of the Union Carbide workers said they would move to Connecticut with the company. Thus both the city AND the state will lose jobs and the corporate and individual taxes they generate.

A lot of misinformation has been disseminated in editorial pages during the past week about the Stavisky-Goodman Bill. The Daily News said it would make the schools "untouchable" in terms of the city's effort to reduce expenses; The New York Post declared that it "would exempt the schools from budgetary reductions dictated by the relentless fiscal crisis facing the city." And in a rebuttal to a response to The Post editorial, its editorial page editor said the bill would give "special, preferential treatment to teachers at the expense of police, firemen and other civil servants." This is nonsense. The bill does not provide a fixed dollar amount for education but mandates a percentage of the city's budget for the schools — cuts in the overall budget will produce a decrease in the money for schools, but at least there will still be a school system. Nor does it mandate preferential treatment for teachers — it requires only that education personnel and the students in their charge not bear twice as big a burden as anyone else when cuts in staff and services come.

No one supporting this bill suggests that New York City can cease to maintain adequate levels of police and fire protection and other essential services. But it is time to stop regarding education as a frill to be dispensed with — it is as crucial to our survival as any other essential service. And those who would pit teachers against their civil service colleagues ought to recognize that cops and firemen and other city workers have children in the public schools, too, and care about what's happening in those schools.

Finally, perhaps those who rightly care about the safety of New Yorkers ought to be a mite concerned about the safety of children and their teachers. Violence has been escalated in the schools by the budget cuts. One young teacher — among the many injured — received an unprovoked karate chop, spent months in traction, is still out in a neck brace and doesn't think she'll ever teach again — she's too frightened.

This is what our schools have come to, and they will only get worse without the commitment to education that the Stavisky-Goodman Bill reflects.

The College of New Rochelle is a 120-year-old castle

In many ways, the college we are is the college we were. When founded by the Ursulines in 1904, we were a women's college. Our undergraduate School of Arts and Sciences remains so today. From the beginning, non-Catholic as well as Catholic students were admitted. That hasn't changed. Professional programs supplemented the dominant liberal arts curriculum, as they do today. Academic excellence is as much a cherished tradition as the Gothic-style castle that remains a landmark of our Westchester County campus.

and an internship exploring the potential of closed-circuit TV in family therapy

In other ways, the college we are is the college we will be. In a world of chaotic social and technologic change, we offer young women the flexibility of interdisciplinary studies and career-oriented specialization based firmly in the liberal arts. To enable our students to test their training against real problems, we encourage interaction with the community and on-site job experience for academic credit. To heighten their awareness of other viewpoints, we encourage contact with graduate and adult students who bring their special perspectives to the campus. In this environment we can reaffirm daily the promise we've made for seventy years to young women of ability: "No one can take your place at the College of New Rochelle."

Proponents of the new law include the American Clinical Laboratory Association, which represents labs engaged in interstate commerce and therefore already regulated. Opponents argue that meeting such Federal standards as. internal quality controls, more elaborate record-keeping and regular participation in proficiency tests would unreasonably raise costs for many small laboratories. At present the Administration opposes the proposed law.

The Right To Defame

In a 5-to-3 decision, the Supreme Court has ruled that citizens defamed by public officials cannot sue in Federal courts for deprivation of their civil rights.

The decision did not affect the right to sue public officials in state courts for defamation, and even suggested that was the proper course. But such suits are difficult to bring in many states, because of statutes or legal rules favoring public officials in civil suits. The decision appeared to extend a recent trend toward denying Federal court access to persons complaining of constitutional violations by public officials.

The case was brought by a newspaper photographer in Louisville, Ky., whose name and picture had been distributed to merchants by the police in 1972 on a list of "active shoplifters." The photographer had in fact been arrested for shoplifting but the case was subsequently dismissed. He sued the police for damages under the 14th Amendment, which forbids depriving anyone of "life, liberty or property" without due process of law.

The Court majority ruled, however, that his reputation was neither liberty nor property, and the constitutional prohibition did not apply in the absence of some further loss in consequence of the loss of reputation. The court also held that privacy had not been invaded by the publication of the arrest record.

The dissenting opinion, by Justice William J. Brennan Jr. called the decision potentially "frightening for a free people," and envisioned a possibility of a police department publishing lists of alleged criminals without any recourse on the part of those defamed. But the majority opinion by Justice William H. Rehnquist argued that a decision for the plaintiff would have expanded Federal civil rights law to absurd lengths, turning every injury by a government officer, even one inflicted in a traffic accident, into a constitutional case.

In its first ruling on so-called "reverse discrimination," the Court held that blacks who had been denied jobs in violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are entitled to retroactive seniority. A black now working for an employer who once refused him a job because of discrimination must now receive whatever seniority and other rights he or she would have had if he or she had got the job in the first place, even at the expense of subsequently hired white workers who were not themselves guilty of the discrimination.

The decision would also seem to apply to women who have been discriminated against on the basis of sex. Still unsettled are such related issues as whether retroactive benefits must be awarded to employees who suffered discrimination before the 1964 law was passed. or who refrained from applying for work where discrimination was known to occur.

Other "reverse discrimination" cases still pending include one involving the use of seniority lists to govern lay-off procedures where the Solicitor General and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission differ on whether such use is discriminatory.

A Revival Of Ferry Boats

In 1940, according to Coast Guard figures, there were 584 passenger-carrying ferry boats in the United States. In 1974, there were 267. But the nationwide decline in ferry boats now seems to have been arrested and in some places even reversed.

San Francisco, for example, has had no regular ferry service since the Golden Gate Bridge opened in 1937, but is now building four boats to supplement the overburdened bridge. The first is scheduled to go into service this summer.

New boats are also being planned or built to replace obsolete equipment in Seattle, New Orleans, New York City and San Juan, P.R. In these places and San Francisco, much of the revival is due to the Urban Mass Transportation Administration's willingness to subsidize ferries as part of its national policy.

State and local reluctance, especially in the face of the energy crisis, to sponsor more extensive construction for automobiles is also a factor. The defeat of the proposed Rye-Oyster Bay bridge across Long Island Sound has favored the ferry industry, and two new boats are now under construction for the privately owned Orient Point-New London route, to run year round instead of summers only.

When Women Mature

A 10-year study has found that, contrary to what many people think, American girls apparently are not maturing sexually at an increasingly younger age or growing bigger than past generations.

The study, conducted at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Massachusetts General Hospital, followed the development of 781 girls from middle-class families in a Boston suburb. Some of the findings:

- The average age at which the girls first menstruated, 12.8 years, was not significantly different from the average age at which their mothers first menstruated. The findings, the researchers said, showed that an acceleration in sexual maturation, indicated in previous studies, apparently was no longer occurring.
- Girls in the study were of similar background and of about the same height and weight of girls of the same age studied by research teams in 1943, 1954 and 1973.
- There was "enormous variability" in the age, weight and height of the girls at the time of first menstruation, indicating there are no "norms" for the time of puberty.

The study included a much larger sample of girls and more precise data than have previous studies of its kind. The conclusions were based on statistical observations, and there was no attempt to analyze the differences between present and past data. The researchers said, however, that improved nutrition and public health measures over the years may have been important factors in the changes.

Nearer to Genetic Secrets

Two reports in a recent issue of the British journal Nature indicate that researchers may be closing in on the identity of a substance that controls genetic information in embryonic development, causing cells to differentiate into more specialized cells at the appropriate time.

A group at a laboratory of the Medical Research Council in Cambridge, England, has found that the nuclei of cancerous human cells are dramatically enlarged when they are injected into the enlarged nuclei of immature frogs' eggs. The human nuclei begin to produce ribonucleic acid, which is essential in the synthesis of proteins under genetic control. The inference is that dormant genetic information in the human nuclei has been stimulated by a substance in the frog egg.

That substance may be similar to material called O+ in another report from Indiana University, where experiments with axolotls (a relative of the salamander) at an early stage of embryonic development have shown that the presence of O+ is necessary for development beyond that stage.

Since the nuclei of most cells of an organism carry the entire genetic information of the whole organism, understanding what provokes dividing cells to produce the right kind of offspring at the right time is one of the chief challenges in biology. If and when it is understood, scientists will know why some amphibians, but not humans, can grow a replacement leg, and will be much closer to understanding what has gone wrong in cancerous cells.

Epilogue

A Glance Back at Some Major Stories

■ Resignation

Ruder & Finn, a public relations company, has resigned the account of the Iranian national airline. The relationship has been tenuous since the disclosure earlier this year that Marion Javits, the wife of Senator Jacob K. Javits of New York, had been hired by the agency at $67,500 a year and was working on the Iranian account.

■ Dr. Hammer's Sentence

Dr. Armand Hammer, chairman of the Occidental Petroleum Corporation, has been sentenced to a year's probation and fined $3,000 for making and concealing $54,000 in illegal campaign contributions to the 1972 reelection campaign of former President Richard M. Nixon. Dr. Hammer, who is 77 years old, could have been sentenced to three years in prison.

Dr. Hammer told the court: "I greatly regret my actions. All my life I have tried to lead a useful life, and I trust, in the time that may be allowed me, your honor will give me the opportunity to be a useful member of society."

■ Finis

A tax fraud case against Ingmar Bergman, the Swedish film director, has ended almost as abruptly as it began. The public prosecutor's office has dropped the investigation, saying that it was not able to find any basis for further investigation or for charges against Mr. Bergman. The prosecutors did not explain why, if there is no "evidence" now to support charges, there was cause to seize Mr. Bergman Jan. 30 and question him for more than three hours. The case centers on taxes on $118,000 in income in 1971; it has aroused intense public debate in Sweden over police powers.

Mr. Bergman was reported to have had a nervous breakdown because of his treatment by officials. He has stopped work on current projects. Friends say that he feels he has been humiliated and that he is contemplating moving to Italy.

■ Living in the Cities

The rights of cities to require that municipal employees live within a city's boundaries has been upheld in a recent ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court. Local residency ordinances have been a controversial issue in many parts of the country, including New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. The Court's decision was based on the case of a Philadelphia fireman dismissed after he moved to New Jersey. In New York City, a residency law requiring city employees to live within the five boroughs was repealed in 1962. A bill is pending in the State Legislature to restore the requirement for new employees.

Issues for '76

After years of war, corrosive inflation and political scandal, the national political campaign now under way offers an opportunity of unusual importance. Americans are eager for new, inspiring leadership and for a reinvigorated sense of confidence in the nation's public policies.

If the American people are to make the best use of this election year opportunity, it is vital that their choice of candidates be based on substantive programs and not merely personalities, on rational debate and not on image-making.

The primaries thus far have not contributed greatly to this end; with but rare exceptions, the issues have been submerged in a sea of irrelevancies—from New Hampshire to Florida, from North Carolina to Illinois. But there are still a number of important primary elections to come, and ample opportunity for the respective candidates to discuss the nation's problems and express their convictions, if any.

In the hope of furthering a responsible debate on issues, this newspaper in a series of editorials in the next few days will try to identify some major areas of public concern and to analyze the specific issues emerging in those areas.

The United States, as events in Vietnam and Cuba and Angola have painfully reminded us, is not omnipotent, much less omniscient. The fivefold increase in the world price of oil in the last three years has brought home to the American people their dependence on foreing sources of supply. But the country and its leaders have only begun to face up to the implications of the disappearance of cheap energy.

No future President can rest easy as long as the riddle of nuclear arms control remains unsolved, and these sinister weapons proliferate in the hands of weak, unstable governments. The United States is still the only nuclear guarantor of the defense of both Western Europe and Japan. This country's concerns, moreover, are economic and moral as well as political and strategic. It is the richest nation in a world that is poor and the major food exporter in a world much of which is hungry.

"A rising tide lifts every boat," President Kennedy was fond of saying. But the tide of prosperity has only begun to rise after ebbing last year to its lowest mark—measured by unemployment—since the Great Depression of forty years ago. How soon and by what route can the nation return to full employment? Is inflation to be a permanent accompaniment of the economy in good times and bad? If not, how is it to be dislodged? This year, the nation is asking of its would-be leaders the hardest economic questions of any election since 1932.

Water and air are the indispensable resources not only for prosperity but for life itself. The nation has made measurable progress in the last decade in cleaning up its air and water. Yet not only do the levels of pollution remain dangerously high each year, but there appear new threats to the life-sustaining balance of nature. One would hardly know this from the record of the Ford Administration and of this Congress as strip mine legislation is vetoed and environmental measures, including land-use controls, are stalled.

Critical issues for public debate and decision exist in the realm of social policy—education, health, housing, race relations, transportation, crime control, welfare reform.

What can be done with regard to these problems depends in part upon the Government's allocation of available revenues and therefore depends on the nature of the policies adopted to reduce unemployment and to achieve reasonable economic growth. Even if the Government's financial resources become more abundant, there would still be critical choices to be made among competing strategies. There is evident dissatisfaction about the size of the Federal Government, its capacity to deliver the services it promises, and its sharing of revenue and power with the states and the cities.

"America is promises," a poet once wrote. For the early pioneer heading westward, for the later Southern black and the white mountaineer heading northward, for the European immigrant seeking a better life amidst the grime and toil of tenements and sweatshops, for people everywhere cherishing the dream of individual liberty and self-fulfillment, America has been promises.

Those promises held forth by an open, democratic society take different forms today but they are still alive in the minds of most Americans and of many people elsewhere. After two hundred years, however, America has become a mature society, aware that there are natural limits as well as new frontiers, that major problems are inherently complex, that some of them can only be managed but never solved, and that honesty and truth, not charisma, are the first requirements to be sought in a democratic leader.

Habitat

The United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, to be held in Vancouver in May, will address the universal problems of the built world—a monumental assignment. Habitat, as the meeting is called, is to be the urban equivalent of the Stockholm U.N. conference on the natural environment in 1972.

That meeting served as a useful catalyst because environmental problems were perceived and publicized on an international scale; it was a consciousness-raiser that led to subsequent local action programs and legislation. Habitat will attempt to focus the same kind of attention on the urban condition.

New York's own recent Habitat conference, held as a preliminary to the Vancouver meeting, concentrated on inner city problems in their most particular and painful aspects. As specialized as they seemed, however, this city's financial and breakdown crises are not unrelated to the rest of the world. Dependent populations, delivery of services, deterioration of neighborhoods and, above all, costs form the universal urban horror story of the twentieth century.

Add to this the fact that a population increase of three billion is expected by the year 2000—with urban areas absorbing most of the poor and urbanization growing at twice the rate of population—and the urgency of Habitat is clear. Whether this growth will create the kind of new world settlements that are doomed to substandard sanitation and services, or impact old world cities with problems of money, race, class and decay, the urban crisis is real everywhere in terms of the conditions in which people live. It is simply a matter of time and place and degree.

The danger is that those nations that seek industrialization and urbanization will not heed the warnings of the older cities. The further danger is that the subject will be politicized at Vancouver, as has happened with other U.N. conferences. But Habitat's announced intention is apolitical—to create awareness and provide information on an international scale.

The hope is that it could even lead to a national urban policy in the United States, where the only present policy toward the cities is one of national default.

The Yearning

The yearning for a succession of mild days, for the fresh look and feel of spring, is as natural to man when April is at hand as is the urgency of a wild goose to fly north. That is why we watch so eagerly for daffodils, once crocuses are in bloom. That is why we stop and listen to a brook rushing down a hillside and across a meadow. Brooks chatter of springtime and of full-leafed trees and of nesting birds.

Celandine, weedy cousin of the poppy family, begins to show its green leaves at the country roadside, and celandine just now is a miracle. At the edge of the garden another green marvel appears—chickweed. A few weeks from now we will pull chickweed, try to be rid of it; now we almost welcome it. In the flower garden the green sword-tips of iris appear, and we wonder why the peonies aren't up and promising buds tomorrow. We see the fat buds on the lilac and know but can't quite believe they won't be opening into leaf and fragrant blossom until May.

Daylight has begun to lengthen noticeably. For the first time since October the sun doesn't set until 6 o'clock. We watch it, and we know we are hungry for spring, hungry as the bees gathering pollen at the crocuses. We know deep down that we expect too much of April, but April has a green sound and we want to know the green of chlorophyll again. We yearn for leaves and blossoms.

Necessary Veto

Of all the regions in the world where a spark could ignite a general conflagration and even a Soviet-American nuclear war, none is more dangerous than the Middle East. The search for a provisional settlement between the Arabs and Israel has been given higher priority by the United States than all but one or two international issues and the same should be true of the United Nations, whose vocation is peace.

Unfortunately, confrontation has had the edge over negotiation in most recent United Nations discussions of the issue. The Security Council resolution deploring Israel's policies in Jerusalem and the West Bank, which the United States properly vetoed, continued this misguided trend.

It is a lie—not just incorrect and unbalanced, as Ambassador Scranton diplomatically put it—that the Israeli authorities have been taking measures "aimed at changing the physical, cultural, demographic and religious character of the occupied territories" of the West Bank. Endless repetition of this lie will not make it truth. Nor is there any basis for intimating that the Israeli Government has failed to "respect and uphold the inviolability of the Holy Places," as the Arabs notoriously failed to do when they were in control.

That is not to say that Israel's performance as an occupying power has been perfect. The United States has rightly voiced its disagreement with the establishment of Israeli settlements on the West Bank, and it has rightly insisted that the future of Jerusalem must be settled by negotiation, as must all the issues in dispute. But the central objective at this time must be to regain momentum in Arab-Israeli peace negotiations, as Mr. Scranton emphasized in explaining the American veto.

King Hussein of Jordan may hold the key to the next move and his visit to Washington undoubtedly was in the back of many minds during the U.N. debate. Now that the most pressing issues between Israel and Egypt have been resolved, the time should be ripe to begin negotiation on the next most important problem: the future of the West Bank. Jordan's withdrawal from its traditional position as spokesman for Palestinian interests since the Arab League conference in Rabat has complicated the problem. The Palestine Liberation Organization—given its refusal to accept Israel as a state—is not a viable interlocutor. Jordan is far more likely to bring the Palestinians—and ultimately the P.L.O.—into the negotiations essential to their political future.

A negotiating formula for the West Bank will not be found easily or quickly. But it must be found if a peace settlement is to be achieved. A return to the Geneva conference, even if it were feasible, would have meaning only if it were the method for bringing a West Bank negotiation about. This, not tendentious resolutions, should be the focus of United Nations attention, if peace is the objective.

Letters to the Editor

Of Medical Education and Political Control

To the Editor:

Everyone interested in medical education should read Senator Edward M. Kennedy's March 21 letter, not because the Senator is right, but because his letter brings fundamental issues into the open.

The Senator complains that only 35 percent of medical students come from families earning less than $15,000 a year, while 37 percent come from families earning more than $25,000 a year. Most of us in medical education think our task is to select and educate those applicants best qualified. Senator Kennedy thinks we ought to select and educate on the basis of economic origin and not competence.

It is unjust that students from lower-income families are often less well qualified to enter medical schools, because the disadvantages of their environment often tend to deny them educational opportunities equal to their native talents. I would like to join Senator Kennedy in addressing that issue in all its complexity. I do not instead wish to see lowered standards imposed on medical schools by Federal edict.

The Senator further complains that medical schools train too many surgeons, and he goes on to denigrate that specialty without bothering with proof. Most of us in medical education think it proper to advise and guide students but also to preserve as much freedom as possible for students to select that specialty which they find most attractive. Senator Kennedy wants to eliminate all freedom of choice for students. He thinks that medical schools should dictate specialties to medical students under direct orders from the Federal Government.

Society does need more primary-care specialists in medical practice, and I would like to join Senator Kennedy in the effort to create more incentives for medical students to select those specialties. Denouncing the profession of surgery with unsupported generalities instead helps no one.

Because of these deep disagreements, we are all in Senator Kennedy's debt for taking these issues out of the relative seclusion of Congressional hearings and into public print. The American people need to hear and understand these arguments. They may have to choose between quality medical education and federally governed medical education. I do not think they can have both. I also hope that we can persuade Senator Kennedy and the American people that quality medical education without political controls remains one of the best investments for public funds.

School Remedial Work: The Relevancy Gap

To the Editor:

Though we've been alerted for years now on how poorly prepared college freshmen are to master the reading assignments in college courses, we're reminded in Gene Maeroff's "Rise in Remedial Work Taxing Colleges" article (March 7) that they can't write or compute either.

As chairman of a high school English department I'm aware of one reason why remedial work—in reading and writing at least—which we supply in abundance, is missing the mark, nationwide, and passing the burden onto the college campus where, in fact, it doesn't belong.

It's axiomatic that one learns how to write by writing: to read, by reading. We write about things that matter to us deeply, just as we read when there's an impelling reason for it: information, entertainment, identification, projection. Interest is the moving force.

Remedial teachers all too often ignore these basic truths. In their (quite legitimate) concern with correctness, structure, technique and test scores, they forget the human beings before them who are involved with the challenges of growing up, sexually, socially, psychologically; with their economic future; with the sports world; with Oscar nominations, etc.

Thus, in remedial writing classes, we aim at proper parsing, punctuation and paragraphing without taking the next, natural step: encouraging function by inviting youngsters to use their skills on subjects paramount in their lives. In remedial reading classes across this land there are captive audiences chained to paralyzing boredom. This is not to argue against reading and writing efficiently as prime and proper goals. I admit that we have erred for too long in shooting for writing creativity at the expense of correctness, and for reading widely without a real grasp of what the page is revealing. I submit that, until there is a wedding of meaningful content to solid structure, the results we get in remedial classes will hardly be commensurate with the millions of dollars we spend on them.

Campaign 'Football'

To the Editor:

It was gratifying to read in The Times (March 21) that Ronald Reagan had directed his North Carolina campaign organization to stop circulating a pamphlet that made it appear that President Ford favored Senator Brooke of Massachusetts to be his running mate.

But one wonders what goes through the mind of the Senator, intellectually superior to either of them, when he finds these two mediocre men using him for a political football.

Report From Angola

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter from Pereira d'Eca, one of the last towns still held in Angola by UNITA. The Cuban accusations at the United Nations concerning the refugees here are untruths as blatant as I have heard in thirty years of observing the African scene.

All around me are pitiful refugees who have fled from the M.P.L.A. An hour ago I talked with three officers from the F.N.L.A. who are deathly afraid that they will be murdered by UNITA soldiers, by SWAPO (South-West African People's Organization) or by the many M.P.L.A. sympathizers who have infiltrated the town. Others are convinced that they will be murdered by the M.P.L.A. or the Cubans when they come here.

Fortunately, the South African Army is feeding the refugees, but their destiny is not up to the South Africans. Two officials from Portugal decide who can leave Angola. Their criteria are rather racist: South Africa may send to Portugal only those who are white, have one white grandparent or are married to a white. No Africans who were associated with the Portuguese administration, UNITA or the F.N.L.A.—and appear marked for execution—receive political asylum.

Perhaps it is not realized at the United Nations or in the American mission that the refugees here now are almost all poor, and 80 percent of them are black. The well-to-do Portuguese left long ago. Help is urgently needed. The water system is out. The lights are gone. Sanitation is minimal. The International Red Cross has come with so little and so late. And now to read the Cuban calumny that there would be no refugee problem if not for the South Africans—a lie worthy of Joseph Goebbels.

The bitterness I hear from UNITA officers toward the South Africans for refusing to give them any military supplies creates continual tension between these ex-allies, but there is fault enough to go around. Many refugees tell me that UNITA troops brutalized them in Sa da Bandeira, the present front 200 miles north. This town changed hands four times between M.P.L.A. and UNITA before the South Africans intervened. Two English-speaking South African army doctors and a Portuguese nurse are valiantly trying to care for refugees while the Portuguese decide who will be allowed to leave.

Meanwhile, the United Nations postures over technicalities in refusing to help the suffering Africans here.

Into the Ring, and Just About Out

By Tom Johnson

MONTGOMERY, Ala.—It might be a bit premature to pronounce for all time the end of Gov. George C. Wallace as a political force, but his most passionate supporter would find it frustrating to argue that Mr. Wallace's political fortunes have not been severely modified by his losses in the Florida and North Carolina Presidential primaries, losses made more wounding for having been inflicted by another Southerner, Jimmy Carter.

Whereas in 1972 Mr. Wallace, almost alone among the Democratic candidates, was amplifying the grievances and discontents of a sizable chunk of Americans, this year he has found himself in crowded company. He sees himself pre-empted on all sides. On no issue can Mr. Wallace any longer say, "This one is all mine."

As the curtains begin to close on twelve years of Mr. Wallace as a Presidential candidate, he can contemplate the minor irony that the decisive primary, North Carolina's, might never have taken place but for him. When a move was made a year ago to abolish that primary, Mr. Wallace flew to Raleigh and led his supporters in keeping the primary law alive.

A much larger irony is that had there been no Wallace in all those years past, there might well have been no Carter running for the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1976.

Beginning in 1964, when Mr. Carter was still a state senator, Mr. Wallace set forth on the first of his national campaigns, derided as a presumptuous interloper who would shortly be retired permanently to the noxious South where he belonged. Even in Alabama more people than not thought at the time that Mr. Wallace must be unhinged.

But four years later, Mr. Wallace was at it again, running under the double handicap of being a disorderly Southerner and also running on a third-party ticket, scoffing at doubters with the retort that a Southerner would make as good a President as anyone else and that Southerners who felt otherwise were laboring under an inferiority complex. He got 13 percent of the vote and carried five states—only one less than Barry Goldwater had carried in 1964 and four more than George McGovern was to win in 1972.

In 1972, all that Mr. Wallace had aspired to accomplish came together—to a degree that the Governor who, himself, is not free of the inferiority complex that he exhorts others to shed, could not have imagined. He marched through Florida, North Carolina, Michigan and Maryland and was leading each of the other candidates in popular votes when he was shot out of the race in Maryland.

Mr. Wallace showed then, and perhaps for all time, that a Southerner could do it. In the most conspicuous way, he expunged the stigma that had clung to the deep South since the Civil War—the notion that access to national politics was automatically foreclosed to a Southern candidate.

The lesson was not lost on Jimmy Carter, who is perking along trails that Mr. Wallace surveyed, cleared, and made passable. In a special sense, Mr. Carter is Adam's rib, or more precisely, Mr. Wallace's and is prospering because there was a Wallace against whom to wage a counterpoint campaign.

It may well be that history will judge that Mr. Wallace's most lasting contribution was in opening up the Northern badlands to safe and effective exploration by Southern candidates. Because of him, it wouldn't be surprising if from here on every Presidential year has a distinct Southern flavor, with a Southerner winding up in the White House.

Mr. Wallace had twelve years joyously yanking the tiller this way and that, but it was never meant that he would be the captain—still less this year when the circumstances began closing in. Mr. Wallace had always been what he was—typecast as the bad boy from down South, always doggedly chugging along outside the mainstream, cheerfully biting the heads off grenades and leaving a happy trial of explosions in his pursuers' path.

This year, bound to a wheelchair, his manner softened by the attempt on his life, fresh candidates rising to make common property of the issues, Mr. Wallace could see the Presidential phase of his career coming to a close.

The younger Southerners who come after him will have a much clearer shot at national office, having come along at a time when it was not necessary to be recorded as a segregationist.

Mr. Wallace said it all, wistfully, it seems, to a group of insurance executives in Winston-Salem, N. C. a few days ago:

"I supported the system we had of schools back in '62 and '63 and I never apologized for it. I'm not one who said, 'Oh, I was for it in a way, but it wasn't in my heart.' No, I was raised that way . . . and since we lost the legal battles, let's go forward . . . but don't be dishonest about it. Don't tell people, 'Oh, well, I had to say that but I didn't mean it.' I wasn't raised that way."

The final irony: Had Mr. Wallace been less than what he is, he would never have attracted enough attention to be a Presidential candidate, but being what he is, it was never possible that his candidacy would succeed.

Tom Johnson is editor of The Montgomery Independent, a weekly newspaper in Alabama long friendly to George C. Wallace.

The Carter Coalition

By Tom Wicker

On the night of Jimmy Carter's victory over George Wallace in the North Carolina Democratic primary, Senator Henry Jackson paused while campaigning in Brooklyn to say:

"[Carter] has his work cut out for him because he will not have the support of the groups that decide the election—the nationalities groups, the labor groups and so on."

That same night, Mr. Carter was campaigning in St. Louis (he is the only candidate as yet making much of an effort to win Missouri's 71 delegates in the caucuses beginning April 20). Speaking by telephone to his North Carolina supporters, he said he had received "strong support from urban and rural, black and white, young and old, conservative and liberal." It was, he said, "a kind of Carter coalition."

Not only do the statistics from North Carolina bear out Mr. Carter (he defeated Governor Wallace even in the rural and conservative Coastal Plain and became the first Democratic candidate to win a majority over the field in any state primary); but there is a world of difference in the "Carter coalition" and the view of the election expressed by Henry Jackson in Brooklyn. Mr. Jackson's is the old politics of labor and nationalities; no matter how much he talks of reconstructing "the Roosevelt coalition," he is the one who proposes a narrow base for a national campaign in the 70's—no appeal to blacks, to the party elements that supported Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy and nominated George McGovern, or to those Americans disillusioned and dismayed by Watergate, the abuses of the C.I.A. and F.B.I., and the "mess in Washington."

It is not, in fact, Mr. Carter but Mr. Jackson who has yet to demonstrate broad vote-getting appeal. He keeps saying Mr. Carter must "prove himself" in a major industrial state; but Mr. Carter has run first in New Hampshire and Vermont, third in Massachusetts, first in Florida, Illinois and North Carolina. When is Henry Jackson going to demonstrate that he can win where organized labor is not strong and he has no busing controversy to exploit?

Any independent observer must concede that the most remarkable fact of the 1976 campaign so far is Jimmy Carter's demonstrated ability to appeal virtually all across the spectrum of Democratic voters. Just for example:

¶In Florida, he won 72 percent of the black vote and in Illinois about half of it, while remaining the second choice of Wallace voters.

¶In Illinois, he took at least fourteen delegate places against downstate candidates pledged to Senator Adlai E. Stevenson as a favorite son (granted Mr. Stevenson did not campaign).

¶He got as much as 30 percent of the total votes in New Hampshire precincts where George McGovern ran well in 1972—and also in precincts where Richard Nixon scored heavily.

¶In New Hampshire, his winning coalition was center-right; when Mr. Jackson and Governor Wallace took over the right in Massachusetts, Mr. Carter still ran third with his appeal to moderates.

¶In New Hampshire, the "Carter coalition" included low-income groups, conservative Democrats, older voters, blue-collar workers and the less-educated.

¶In Florida, he beat both Mr. Wallace and Mr. Jackson in liberal areas, ran even with Mr. Wallace in blue-collar districts, beat him in the rural north, and trounced Mr. Jackson in conservative central Florida.

These facts suggest not just a "Carter coalition" but a winning coalition. They ought to give pause to those who call Representative Morris Udall the "only horse to ride" for liberal Democrats, and those who talk of the "Roosevelt coalition" Senator Jackson says he can put together. Because some other facts are that (a) the Democratic left has nominated only George McGovern since the Roosevelt era, and lost a landslide with him; and (b) whatever "coalition" Mr. Jackson puts together won't include blacks or the Democratic left or even all the labor unions. And still another fact is that only Jimmy Carter of these three has shown any appeal in the newly populous "sunbelt" states, some substantial number of which will have to be carried by a Democrat who wants both to win and to be able to govern.

As for allegations that Mr. Carter ducks the issues, those who have followed the campaign know that his views are at least as clear and often more specific than those of Mr. Jackson or Mr. Udall. To cite one interesting comparison between the three:

On the morning of Oct. 21, 1973, after President Nixon's "Saturday night massacre" a few hours earlier, Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia called a news conference and said that "firing Archibald Cox" was "an action that warrants impeachment." On Oct. 23, Mr. Udall—now supported by Mr. Cox—called only for an inquiry and Mr. Nixon's resignation. On the same day, Henry Jackson said that talk of impeachment was "premature."

IN THE NATION

Carter's ability to appeal all across the spectrum of Democratic voters is remarkable.

The Undefeated General

By C. L. Sulzberger

PARIS—Lord Montgomery was Britain's greatest general since Wellington but, unlike the Iron Duke, he was distinctly unpopular—at least with his peers. Generals Patton and Bradley couldn't stand him; General Eisenhower resented his criticisms and didn't think much of his skill; Lieut. Gen. Hans Speidel, Rommel's chief of staff, told me:

"Montgomery was a terrible commander. You could always predict exactly what he would do and you knew that he would rest and draw things together always after so many days of battle. He had only one maneuver—a left hook."

Eisenhower confided: "Montgomery did a great thing in reviving the spirit of the defeated Eighth Army in Egypt. He had something of Cromwell about him. However, he had all kinds of complexes. He did not come from the top level of society. He had not gone to the best public school. He was a little insignificant fellow as a young man and had never been popular."

Another time Eisenhower added: "Montgomery is not a good strategist. He moves too slowly. During the Normandy breakout (1944) Montgomery failed to utilize to its full potentialities the Falaise 'killing ground.' Montgomery thought he had done well but he missed a great opportunity."

Once Eisenhower even criticized the way Monty fought his greatest victory, El Alamein, moving around salt and pepper cellars as division symbols (at lunch), sketching battle lines on a paper table cloth, and showing how he would have penetrated Rommel's minefields with tanks, then exploited the opening. I forgot to keep the cloth as a memento: "Ike's battle plan for El Alamein."

Even if great military captains looked down on the perky little hero of the western desert, this was by no means the case with the English public and the soldiers who fought for Monty. He gave them a new spirit and a first taste of victory. They never forgot.

Wellington was rewarded for his triumphs with a dukedom and the splendor of palatial Apsley House on Piccadilly. Monty became only a viscount (fairly low on the lordly pecking order) and got a modest country home in Hampshire with scarcely any grounds. Oddly enough, the best way to drive there from central London was by passing Apsley House.

Islington Mill, Montgomery's retreat, was decorated with a mass of knickknacks and several bad oil paintings, four of them full-length portraits of Monty. His library featured Burke's Peerage and Who's Who among its few dozen books.

He displayed an astonishing collection of souvenirs including an ugly Bavarian bottle top and a brass tag naming him honorary member of a West Canadian press club. And he had many inscribed photographs including one bearing the words: "To Monty. Hard times; stern conflict; victorious commander! Winston S. Churchill 1946."

I talked to Montgomery on various occasions. After Suez he said: "The Israelis hit Egypt for six. We should have let them finish the job themselves." He liked de Gaulle because: "He chucked out the useless politicians. Now he has a proper set-up in France."

He sniffed: "You Americans think everything is solved by dollars." He reflected: "The greatest leader I have met is Churchill. Stalin was a great leader, ruthless; but without Stalin the Russians would have quit the war."

He recognized the massive importance of Russia and China. Regarding the first, he reckoned East European discontent was "a very good thing: If Russia attacks the West, all those nations would rise up and bite her in the tail." On the second: "The key to peace is China. Soon there will be a billion Chinese armed with nuclear weapons. We should detach China from Russia and vice versa and get them looking our way."

Fighting was his profession. He cautioned: "Rule one of war is, don't march on Moscow. That is rule one of war. Lots of people have tried it but nobody has succeeded. Napoleon got there but he had to get out. Hitler didn't even get there. You can destroy Moscow without invading it. You can destroy it with atomic rockets.

"Rule two of war is don't march on China. China is like a sponge. Any army that gets into China will be squeezed and forced out. Just like a sponge. You have to stand back and pound China with rockets."

A wiry, tough little man. Even if Arnhem was a standoff, he never lost a battle. Maybe other generals didn't like him. The British people did.

Once More in Academe, Purists vs. Utilitarians

By BENJAMIN DeMOTT

Utilitarians and their enemies are at each other's throats again in American colleges and universities.

Sometimes the dispute comes to the surface in genteel form, pitting knowledge valued for its uses against knowledge valued "for its own sake." Sometimes the focus is the large course versus the small course, or the department with high enrollment versus the department starved for students.

Sometimes contention centers on published data about student preferences. Two months ago, the American Council on Education released figures comparing the preferred fields of study of freshmen who entered college in 1974 and 1975 with those of freshmen entering in 1966. The data showed, among other things, a steady movement toward "applied fields"—business, health professions, agriculture, forestry and the like—and away from less immediately utilitarian subjects. One much discussed statistic disclosed that 22 percent of entering freshmen in 1966 intended to major in English, humanities, fine arts or mathematics, while in 1975 the same subjects were chosen by only 10 percent of the first-year students.

Whatever the focus of discussion in this area, the invariable byproducts seem to be bitterness, suspicion and anger.

This winter the faculty dean of a New England college asked individual faculty members to estimate the probable enrollments in the courses they planned to teach next year. "It may be necessary," the dean added blandly, "to ask some faculty to do additional teaching."

The roar of rage echoed through the faculty dining room and out into the student newspaper. The dean underwent a grilling from the faculty executive committee, wrote a two-page letter of clarification, and was obliged to place the "issue" high on the agenda of the next faculty meeting. The chairman of the college's special curriculum committee opined, in public, that faculty competition for students was causing great inflation and a decline of standards. And one humanities professor was heard to refer, in faculty meeting, to teachers of large courses as "whores."

At the root of the rumble is—once more—the higher education money crisis. Post-Sputnik resentment about imbalance in the allocation of resources was tempered by the brio of academic expansionism — salaries, research funds, and enrollment were almost universally up—and by the willingness of the Federal Government to grant a piece of the action even to disciplines lacking a visible utilitarian side.

In the mid-70's, the safety valves are gone, and one academician's success is perceived as another's imminent budget cut. Nowadays, money to pay extra hands for an ascendant department can only be found by stripping a discipline down the list.

Despite the bitterness it arouses, hard-edged utilitarianism is by no means all bad. Tenured loafers are not uncommon on university faculties. More than a few teachers confuse dullness with rigor, dismiss concern for the public contexts of higher learning as unscholarly, and regard a light teaching load as a gentleman's perquisite rather than as a challenge to a working professional's powers of creation. When the budget-obsessed utilitarian shoots a rocket into faculty self-indulgence and self-deception, he not only helps to curb rising tuition bills, he improves the over-all tone of academic life.

But the utilitarian does have weaknesses and blind spots. Among the worst are the following:

● Extravagant faith in the "hot occupation." In accepting the tyranny of the market place, utilitarian planners promote career fads that inevitably cool off in time. The chill that touched other once-hot occupations—nuclear physicist, astrophysicist, sociologist—may one day reach the economist.

● Dimness about how to cope with the cycle of fashion. An error as common among utilitarians as the shutdown is the pindown, under which an academic department with currently low enrollment is fixed at a level of teaching personnel insufficient to enable it to energize and restructure itself in preparation for eventual resurgence. A recent City University of New York planning paper omitted philosophy from a list of growth disciplines essential to future CUNY curricula—sign of a pindown, or worse, in process. (According to recent reports, this mistake has lately been rectified.)

● Faith in false parity. Utilitarian planners often ignore department variations in teaching practice that have a direct bearing on budget items. The treasurer of an eastern liberal arts institution recently proposed a two-thirds cut in his English department's budget request for multilithing and Xerox funds. His aim was to bring the budget item in line with that of other departments. As it happened, the bulk of the English department's copying money was spent in support of classroom work, while in departments cited as spending less, Xerox money went largely to reproduce learned papers for the private libraries of the instructors. Parity here was counter-productive.

As is obvious, both sides in the current quarrel could profit from fresh perspectives. Utilitarian academic administrators need a new negotiating stance—conversant with cycles of academic fashion but not terrorized by them, prepared to probe for the levels at which an out-of-fashion discipline can continue to be represented in a way that will assure the chance for a future, aware that there are values, ideas, bodies of work that the university has an obligation to keep in currency, regardless of ratings.

The opposition for its part needs a clear sense of economic reality, less hostility to successful teachers, and more curiosity about their methods, greater sympathy with the notion that when ratings decline, the proper response is not to criticize society but to seek grounds for revitalization.

None of these virtues is a substitute for money, and from this it follows that, whatever happens to the manners of utilitarians and their enemies, the tension between them will last for the duration.

Benjamin DeMott is professor of English at Amherst College.

'You Can't Eat Beauty'

Monuments vs. the Environment

By STEVEN V. ROBERTS

ATHENS—Homer writes that Telemachus landed at Pylos, on the Bay of Navarino in southwestern Greece, when he came to ask Nestor for news of his father, Odysseus. The ruins of Nestor's palace, from which there is a broad view of the bay, have been discovered a few miles away.

The Greek Government recently announced that a large shipyard would be built at Pylos and that steel and cement plants would also be constructed in the vicinity. The $550 million project, the Government said, would provide needed jobs in one of Greece's poorest regions.

The National Archeological Council, which had recommended against the project, resigned en masse. Editorial writers joined the protests. The magazine New Greece said: "This kind of progress cannot bring happiness. Future generations will mourn the blight we have cast on their lives."

The Pylos project poses a difficult question. Greece clearly wants, and needs, the benefits of economic growth. Just as clearly, the monuments and landscape of the country belong to the whole civilized world, and should be preserved.

Can these two values be reconciled in some acceptable balance between economic growth and protection of the cultural environment?

"Progress" has already imperiled several other relics of ancient Greece, such as the Sanctuary of Demeter at Elefsis. Demeter was the goddess of fertility, and her daughter, Persephone, was kidnapped by Hades and carried off to the underworld. The goddess retired to Elefsis and refused to allow the crops to grow until Persephone was returned.

Elefsis thus became the site of the mysteries of Demeter, one of the most secret of ancient rites. The celebrations were preceded by a solemn public procession along the "sacred way" between Athens and Elefsis, a distance of 10 miles.

Today, the "sacred way" is lined with shipyards, oil refineries and other industry. The site of the mysteries is surrounded by factories and choked with smoke.

Ancient Greek monuments are not simply piles of stone and statuary. They were built in harmony with their natural surroundings, and it is impossible to separate the two.

The Sanctuary of Demeter cannot be appreciated if there is an oil refinery looming in the background, belching yellowish effluent. The view from Nestor's palace across the Bay of Navarino is almost as important as the building itself.

The bay, moreover, is one of the best natural harbors in the Mediterranean Sea, and countless wrecks lie beneath its waters, waiting to be explored. More than 50 Turkish and Egyptian ships were sent to the bottom there during the climactic battle of the Greek war of independence in 1827.

Also threatened by "progress" are the monuments on the Acropolis of Athens, the brightest achievements of the Classical Age. A United Nations study reported recently that air pollution had done more damage to the monuments in the last 40 years than in the last four centuries. The Government has announced that it would eventually remove the sculptures still on the Acropolis and replace them with plaster casts. Meanwhile, it might inclose the statuary in glass cases to shield them from rain and pollution.

Officials would also like to ban the use of fossil fuel for heating, a move that has been taken successfully in Venice. But there is little they can do about the exhaust from the automobiles that crowd the streets at the base of the sacred rock. Nor is there any real chance of removing the industry at Elefsis, which can be seen from the Acropolis. The industry has to be somewhere.

Government officials say they will surround the shipyard at Pylos with a greenbelt and apply strict antipollution standards, but their record so far is poor. To take one example, the beach at Amarthon, where the Greeks fought the Persians in 490 B.C., is now pocked with tar and littered with refuse.

The conflict between economic development and preservation of the cultural environment is not strictly a Greek problem. The Aswan High Dam in Egypt would have flooded numerous monuments if the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization had not stepped in and launched a worldwide campaign to save them.

In Venice, huge petrochemical plants provide a major source of income, but they also produce corrosive pollutants that are destroying the stones and colors of the city at an alarming rate. Officials are afraid to enforce antipollution laws too stringently for fear of threatening the area's economy.

People leave Pylos or Aswan or Venice looking for work, and they swell the populations of Athens or Cairo or Milan. Economic planners say that local, decentralized industry is the answer, but in each case, development has threatened priceless parts of the world's collective cultural heritage.

The jobless and the industrialists are not merely money-grubbers, but given a choice, they will take progress over preservation almost every time. As one business man in Pylos put it, "What are we going to eat, beauty?"

Pylos also resents the intellectual elites in Athens who already have their comforts and chide others for wanting the same thing. The intellectuals reply that precisely because they do not have a direct economic interest in Pylos, they can, and should, defend other values.

The whole debate is like a Socratic dialogue: endless questions, few firm answers. Another Greek philosopher, Aristotle, posited the ideal of the golden mean. It is as difficult to find as ever.

27 Italian Medical and Veterinary Schools Accept American Students

Medical and veterinary school aspirants who are thinking of applying to Italian medical schools, and their families, must act immediately. New Italian government regulations require that preinscription applications be filed with Italian Consulates before April 15, for consideration for medical and veterinary school admission in 1976.

27 distinguished Italian medical schools accept Americans. Several hundred Americans now are studying at Italian medical and veterinary schools. Medical, dental and veterinary school aspirants who need assistance in language and cultural orientation and preparation before, during and after medical school to enable the practice of medicine in the U.S., should contact the Institute of International Medical Education. We believe the Institute has helped more American men and women enter European medical and veterinary schools than any other organization. Advanced placement for holders of science post-graduate degrees.

Of the approximately 40,000 premeds and graduate students who will apply to American medical schools this year, about 355 will be accepted. Contact Student Information Office.

The New York Times

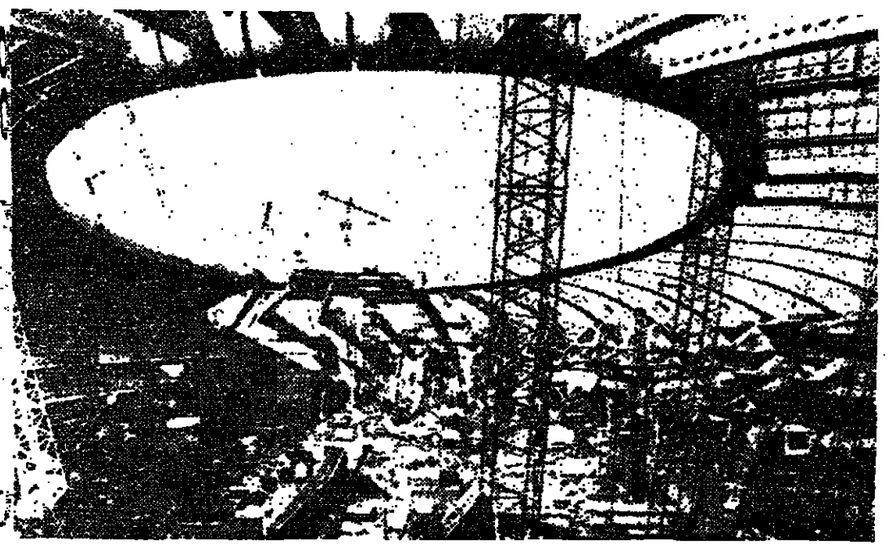
view of the Olympic complex in Montreal and, below, the interior of the main Olympic stadium



By STEVE CADY

Special to The New York Times

MONTREAL—Picture yourself planning a dinner party and then falling asleep six hours before the guests are due to arrive.

Suddenly you are being shaken awake. The house is a mess, the table unset, the good silverware unpolished. You haven't shelled the fresh shrimp or prepared the hors d'oeuvres or mixed the cocktails or taken the steaks and strawberries out of the freezer. And the guests will be arriving in five minutes.

On a much larger scale, the same kind of desperation is being felt in official circles here these days and nights as Montreal rushes to get its billion-dollar table set in time for the July 17 opening of the costliest Olympic Games ever staged. Ten weeks before the construction deadline, the Olympic Installation Board has begun racing the clock instead of the calendar.

At unfinished Olympic Stadium, centerpiece of a daringly different new sports complex, specialists in a gold-medal labor force of more than 4,000 people are earning up to $1,500 a week as round-the-clock construction proceeds. Laborers get $6 an hour, crane operators $16, and overtime pads the average work week to 80 hours.

More Time for Proper Finish

"We'll finish it in time," a young electrician said wearily the other day as he prepared to hail a cab after working 18 straight hours at the site. "But afterwards, we need two more years to finish good."

With frills and even non-frills continuing to be slashed from the architect's controversial $40-million blueprints, it is now apparent the guests will be getting scrambled eggs in many cases instead of shrimp and steak.

Another electrician, an Ontario man with business interests in Montreal, said talks with friends at the site had convinced him the job was not being done properly.

"It's a racket," he said. "Too many people with connections. They're just gluing it together now, cutting corners all over the place. You'll see a lot of big defects showing up in a couple of years."

Five men already have died in accidents at the site, four of them on March 8 when a hollow segment of concrete they were working inside fell 150 feet to the floor of the stadium. The most recent accident, which caused no injuries, occurred only last Tuesday when another segment of concrete broke away from a beam and plunged into scaffolding below.

Inside the rubble-strewn stadium, a visitor found it hard to believe the $300-million facility could be completed by June 6, when all 21 competitive sites must be turned over to the Olympic Organizing Committee. There was no sign of a track, no sign of a grass infield, no sign of seats in those sections of the stands that had been completed.

The "technical ring," a hollow, 21-foot-high tube of concrete that forms the inner circumference of the roof, was still not complete. This was a surprise, because a press release issued a week earlier said the ring had been finished.

A forest of cranes, 35 of them, rested on beds of ice or muddy ground strewn with orange peels from the lunch-pails of workers. A request to climb up into the stands was denied by an engineer guide who explained, "To get into the stands, we are obliged to use a crane."

Outside the stadium, access ramps from two new subway stations were still a long way from completion. The stations, built by the city's spendid Metro system to whisk visitors from downtown Montreal to the stadium site, are not yet officially open.

Yet as warmer weather loosened the ice and melted drifts of dirty snow lining Montreal's streets, the consensus seemed to be that the table would get set in time for the 21st Olympics.

Optimism of Rousseau

"The doubt has gone," said Roger Rousseau, president of the Olympic Organizing Committee, offering a stack of lavishly printed new promotional brochures in his high-ceilinged office at what used to be the old city courthouse. "We are going to make it."

Rousseau is probably right. But it's going to be a photo-finish. Don't be surprised if landscapers are still stuffing trees and shrubs into the ground while the torch-bearer is lighting the Olympic flame.

Around town, working people here share Rousseau's confidence that the show will take place on schedule. But not all of them share his pleasure at that prospect.

"Some people are proud," a cab driver said, "but the majority is not happy. It's gonna cost too much money for two weeks. You know?"

Said a customs inspector at the airport: "Who's going to pay the bill? It's an obscene monument to a vain man."

His reference was to Jean Drapeau.

ies stunned a crowd of 17,540 in the Spectrum. Among those hardest hit was the Scarlet coach, Tom Young.

Indiana, the remaining undefeated college team in the nation, met the defending champion, the University of California, Los Angeles in the other semifinal.

The Hoosiers led, 34-36, at the half.

The 43-year-old Young was apparently so stunned by the setback that he went into a long criticism of his team's effort immediately after the one-sided game.

"We stunk the place out," he said.

"To me it's a shame for Rtugers, a shame for Eastern basketball. I don't think Michigan is that good a team."

Hardly giving the Wolverines credit, Young continued: "I think we're really embarrassed. We didn't play our kind of basketball and didn't keep our poise. We lost it for about 10 minutes and then lost the game.

"Obviously Phil Sellers didn't have a good tournament, but I can't blame it on him. We shot poorly."

Rutgers, which had lived by speed and quickness, died that way as it went up against a team capable of maintaining the pace Scarlet had used for its victories.

Sellers, who had only 3 points in the first half, finished with 11. John Robinson, the big man for Michigan, led all scorers with 20 points and also led in rebounds with 16.

Neither team started at high speed, contrary to what had been expected. It was more a matter of feeling ach other out to see where quick strikes might be made.

Rutgers' shooting was poor in the opening minutes, particularly on close-in shots. Given a half-dozen shots under the boards, the Scarlet Knights sank only one and led by 3-1 after a minute and a half.

Despite its inaccuracy, Rutgers built an 8-4 lead, but it did not last long. Michigan came back with 4 points by Steve Grote to tie the game, then, on the first fast-break score moved to a 13-10 lead. Wayman Britt scored a fast-on the fast break as he and Rickey Green outraced Phil Sellers in a two-on-one play.

Sellers, who has been known to bait officials, owas spoken to strongly by one of of the officials shortly after the start. During a halt in action, the official said to Sellers: "I don't want to hear that again. Not again."

Tom Young, Rutgers' coach, appeared to make a serious error midway through the half when he drew a technical foul as his team was bringing up the bal after two foul-shot conversions by Michigan's John Robinson. The technical was called by Charles Fouty, a Big 10 referee.

Michigan missed the free throw, but kept possession and got a fielod goal on a dirving layup by Green, which made hte score 22-14.

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla., March 27—None of them can make the double play or hit to right field, but they are probably the three most strategic men in baseball. And, less than two weeks from the start of this season weekend promoting the players' revolt, which was triggering the most sweeping economic changes in the game's 150-year history.

They are Herb Osmond, a "financial consultant" who is trying to sell Andy Messersmith, the pitching and legal all-star; Jerry Kapstein, a lawyer who represents 65 other players, and Marvin Miller, the economist who negotiates for all 600 players in the major leagues.

While the 24 teams were rushing through their late spring exhibition games today, all three were in action on the money front. Miller was back in New York hammering out the "basic agreement" that will decide when everybody becomes a free agent. Kapstein was drifting through the training camps here pushing clients such as Steve Garvey, Fred Lynn and Dusty Baker, and Osmond was headed for the base of the California Angels in Palm Springs, hoping to intensify the gold rush for Messersmith.

The latest offer for the pitcher, who was ruled "free" recently by two Federal courts, was $175,000 a year for three years — an offer that Osmond invited by a telephone call to the New York Mets. But with the price for talent spiraling in the new open market, the financial consultant wasn't snapping it up.

"The Mets," he said in a telephone interview, "made the next-to-the-lowest bid of all the clubs. They insulted us with the offer. I think they just made the offer to get on the record.

"The only club that bid lower was the Pittsburgh Pirates: $500,000 for three years. At first, they said they wouldn't guarantee us a no-cut contract, then they called back and said they would. But the Mets won't even give us that."

The standard sprint distance in a 50-meter pool, the kind used in international competition, is 100 meters, and Montgomery holds the world record of 50.59 seconds. This meet, like all other indoor championships in this country, was held over a 25-yard course, so it could produce no world records.

But American records were fragile with the strong competition here, and Montgomery did his share. Last night, he set an American record of 1 minute 36.54 seconds for the 200-yard freestyle, and for three days his relay legs have been astounding.

Montgomery is 21 years old and comes from Madison, Wis. He is slender and soft-spoken, but he is stronger physically than ever before.

"The reason," said Jim (Doc) Counsilman, the Indiana coach, "is his training with an isokinetic exerciser. He puts his power against a piece of equipment. It makes the white fibers in his muscles larger, and those muscles contract in fast movement. In short, it makes him stronger.

Double Edge Sword Scores

Aqueduct found itself fetlock-deep in horses yesterday as the recent influx of racing stock from the South helped produce some of the largest fields of the season.

Even after four program scratches, only two races on the card offered fewer than nine horses. One event drew 12, one 11 and another 10.

Eight were entered in the 52d running of the $56,950 Westchester Handicap. Righ Mind, a former high-priced claimer, carried topweight of 118 pounds in the one-mile contest.

Double Edge Sword, a 9-1 shot ridden by Angel Cordero, won the race in the stakes-record time of 1:33-2/5. The winner, completing a riding triple for Cordero, paid $20.80 after scoring by 4½ lengths. Dr. Emil was second and Bold and Fancy finished third.

Ruben Hernandez rode Right Mind, Jorge Velasquez had the mount on Due Diligence and Ron Turcotte rode Native Guest. Due Diligence ran as an entry with Bold and Fancy, both being trained by Laz Barrera.

The Cuban-born trainer was looking for his third straight Saturday stakes success at the Big A. He accounted for the Toboggan Handicap two weeks ago with Due Diligence and saddled Bold Forbes for an easy victory in the Bay Shore Stakes a week ago yesterday.

A crowd of 33,092 was on hand yesterday for the Westchester.

Bold Forbes, incidentally, won't run in next Saturday's Gotham Mile, the third of four events here designed to get top 3-year-olds on their toes for the Kentucky Derby. Barrera, preparing Bold Forbes for the 1 1/8-mile Wood Memorial on April 17, wants to take some of the early speed out of his colt for the longer races.

Thus, the trainer sees little point in sending him into the Gotham. In the seven-furlong

Radical Sport Movement Re-Examined

By JOHN M. HOBERMAN

Whatever happened to the "radical" sport movement of the late 60's? At that time, a threatened boycott of the 1968 Olympic Games by black American athletes and the televised black-power demonstrations on the victory stand dramatized in a novel way that international sport had existed in bondage to one ideology or another for many years, and that an athletic minority no longer found this role worthy.

During the period, Jack Scott, an obscure teaching assistant at the University of California, Berkeley, was mounting something resembling radical change or ing a classroom and print attack against abuses in American athletics, primarily authoritarian excesses that had been accepted as proper to the closed world of sport.

The insurgent sport movement was led by individuals as devoted as Scott and Harry Edwards, the Berkeley sociologist who tried to organize the Olympic boycott. What is striking is the thinness of the movement's legacy in terms of a viable program of action based on a social theory of sport. For while the considerable liberalization in American sport since 1968 can be traced largely to the efforts of these two activists, one looks in vain today for anything resembling radical changes or even the ambition to achieve it.

This Is Progress?

Children are still taught to admire athetes as male-role models, athletes are still taught to pursue salaries vastly out of proportion to their social value, professional athletics still offer to the immature a dream of perpetual adolescence and sanctioned violence, and football coaches are still accorded stature as philosophers of life. One is entitled to ask whether, for example, well-paid athletes who are finally permitted to wear mustaches, publicly display their sex lives and tuck themselves in before games at the hour of their own choosing really constitute an item on a serious, progressive social agenda.

The failure of the sport movement to create significant changes in the culture of sport, or to come up with theoretical ideas on a grander scale, is a function not only of the regressive aspects of our society, but of the intellectual poverty of the movement since its inception.

The heroes of this revolt have been activists rather than intellectuals. And they have been far more effective on the attack against an enormously vulnerable and primitive structure of values and practices, and in proposing reforms of that structure, than in producing the kind of theory that might prepare the way for dismantling the structure itself.

For any such theory, one question is paramount: What does history tell us about the chances for amending, in this or any other society, a form of human behavior whose very purpose implies at least temporary relief from the burdens of critical thought? The latter point is crucial since sport phenomena are continually suggesting that they be taken at face value and left unanalyzed (sport as enchantment), or that they should not be taken seriously at all (sport as the innocuous).

With this initial difficulty in mind, one can identify several obstacles to and problems for a genuine social theory of sport:

(1) Too many sport radicals are semi-nostalgic former athletes who do not realize that enthrallment with sport exists at the expense of a critical insight that must deal directly with the experience of enthrallment itself if it is to survive in a useful form.

(2) The assumption that no specific ideological bias inheres in sport may be false. When the International Who's Who asked a founder of the British Communist Party to list his leisure interests, his reply was "anything except sports." This sentiment is of more than anecdotal interest. The historical evidence suggests that the right-winger is more interested, and has a greater psychological stake, in sport than his left-wing counterpart.

(3) The world of sport is a haven for authoritarianism and certain pathological and primitive attitudes. What is less understood is the precise nature of the symbiotic relationship within which established sport personalities and values serve as charismatic models for submissive, vacuous or impressionable people, leading them to adopt sport as a congenial symbol of their own attitudes.

(4) In the grand tradition of "positive thinking," sport has promoted an anti-introspective psychological ideal. It offers an informal technology of consciousness—behavior and feeling as "performance"—aimed at giving the individual a feeling of control over his mental life, while the roots of neurosis are left unexamined. It promotes what the philosopher Kierkegaard termed "fictitious" health."

(5) American sport radicals would have been better prepared theoretically had they worked their way through the Marxist sport sociology, primarily West German, that has come out of Europe during the last decade. Such exposure to the ambitions, and false claims, of a large-scale ideological critique of sport would have better enabled American activists to develop the long-range strategy, based on a substantive theory, that has been lacking.

Until the radical sport movement in America begins to deal with these issues, and others like them, its second dawn is likely to be a long time coming.

The Athlete's M Versus Starting

By VICKY KING

I stood there, not quite comprehending, as "The Star-Spangled Banner" was played. To the spectator, this anthem was sentimental and symbolized everything that the athletes stood for. In reality, for the athlete, it stood for pure hell. Hell in the sense that it meant the start of another national swimming meet and the end of just one more year of pain.

Debbie Meyer, my teammate and most formidable opponent, leaned against a post during the anthem. She was trying to psych me out and I knew it. The idea of her leaning against a post while I was standing was supposed to make me feel tired. It worked. It reminded me of how tired I actually was.

The spectators and officials were driving me crazy, as usual. They were there for a good time, and they certainly were having it. Their gaiety and obnoxious laughter gave the scene the pervading air of a country fair. They neither felt nor cared to feel the underlying tension obsessing the participants. It was just like a horse race to them.

I sat there amongst those gibbering fools, infuriated by their insensibility.

"We are humans, not horses," I shouted at them through my thoughts.

Gradually I shut them out and turned to my own world. I started thinking the same inadequate thought that I had come to know just recently.

"What am I going to do this time? God, I'm scared. Help me. Please! Is it going to be like last year? Am I going to choke on my own fear? Stop it! If you are going to think that way, you might as well not even get into the pool. You know you can do it. You're just as good as those other girls. Don't psych yourself out before you start. Just calm down. It'll all come. You can do it. . . . Yeah, maybe. . . . Yeah, I can do it. I know I can. I just have to keep cool.

"Yeah . . . calm . . . calm . . ."

Even after all that, and Norman Vincent Peale, too, I still didn't completely believe that I could beat everyone. That seed of doubt still lurked in my subconscious, and my greatest wish was to either break the race called off. I knew I would r if that happened. No I hated the race it of how I would do

Winning at All Costs: The Fun of Games Is Fading

By MICHAEL S. CANDEL

I was talking with some colleagues recently, discussing the plight of the New York Rangers, the firing of Emile Francis, etc., when one of them said, "The only measure of success in hockey is winning the Stanley Cup, and since Francis couldn't win it, he should have been fired."

Despite my protests, I found myself a minority of one in my belief that such reasoning is the very root-cause of current problems at the Little League, high school, college and professional levels of sport.

Subtly, almost indiscernibly, a real change has taken place in the attitudes of Americans. Where we once joked, "It's not how you play the game, it's whether you win or lose that counts," we no longer say it in jest. We think it, we say it and our actions demonstrate that we have come to believe it.

In fact, we look aghast at those who maintain the seemingly outmoded view that winning is perhaps the least significant of the many values to be gained through sports participation and watching.

You can see this change in the eyes of a 10-year-old when he watches Coach Chuck Noll of the Pittsburgh Steelers hold up the Super Bowl trophy and declare, "This is what it's all about." You can hear it in the high school football locker room when the coach quotes Vince Lombardi's infamous "Winning isn't everything, it's the only thing." And you can read it daily in the sports pages where would-be experts revere the victors and call for the heads of the losers.

The attitudes of the younger generation have been molded during this "only the championship counts" era, and as a result, what was once considered negative sporting behavior has come to be acceptable and even admirable.

Cheerleaders once rooted for their own team; now they root against the opposition. I watched a high school basketball game where the cheerleaders actually recited a "Miss it! Miss it!" cheer as an opposing player stepped to the foul line. What was that about developing sportsmanship?

Where booing was once considered poor taste, it is now common for Knick fans to boo Walt Frazier and his mates when, in their "very expert" opinions, players are not performing up to par.

The idea that the customer has paid for his ticket, and therefore has the right to boo, has been put forth in defense of these patrons. Bunk! The customer has paid only for the right to get into the arena and watch a ball game. Would he have the right to be disruptive if he didn't like a Broadway show he was watching?

What's his recourse? Simple. Don't come back. His recourse does not include the right to be abusive, vulgar and violent—violence is a form of behavior now on the rise—just because his favorite team is not winning or he doesn't like the strategy being used.

And what effect will all this have on the kids whose parents are daring enough to bring them to the stadiums and arenas in our country? Will they do as we say or do as we do? The latter is more likely, based on what's going on right now.

We teach our children to try their best, and then we watch as Yogi Berra, Bill Virdon, Emile Francis and numerous college coaches get fired despite winning, but not championship records.

We listen as the M. Donald Grants of this world say, "He's a wonderful guy and an excellent baseball man, such as Dick Williams and Sparky Anderson, who were not miracle workers either when the talent wasn't on hand.

The Rangers were winners for a decade. No, they didn't win the Stanley Cup, but they went to the finals twice. And they gave their fans plenty of thrills. And they won many more games than they lost.

Unfortunately for fans and management, players get old, other teams get stronger and the cycle reverses itself. During those times, it seems that both groups should make adj thinking and not expe mortals.

A Correction

Through a misreading of a court document, it was incorrectly reported in last Sunday's issue of The New York Times that Bill Bradley of the New York Knickerbockers had an income from endorsements in three seasons (1969-70, 1973-74, 1974-75) for which such a figure was given.

In fact, Bradley had no income from endorsements in those years, or in any other year; the figures given were the totals of his income from personal appearances and teaching at summer camps.

Sports Editor's Mailbox: Al McGuire One of a Kind

To the Sports Editor:

Jimmy Breslin's sterling portrayal of Al McGuire was a source of great pleasure for me. McGuire is a unique personality to be sure; he is one college basketball coach who views the game from the proper perspective. His tenacity of purpose does little to inhibit his uncanny ability to relate to his ballplayers and make the game fun. McGuire's adamant refusal to permit Marquette basketball to assume life-and-death proportions is a singular manifestation of his broadened horizons. Breslin's allusion to McGuire's heightened perception of the black man's plight provides an even more impressive example of the latter's open-minded philosophy. All of this, buttressed by his enviable coaching record, makes Al McGuire one of a kind.

National Rankings Questioned as Guide

To the Sports Editor:

The fallacy of national rankings is exemplified by the final writers' poll regarding college basketball teams. Rutgers is listed in fourth place with a total of 720 points. Princeton, which played evenly with Rurgers during most of their first contest and came within the width of a Wheaties flake of winning the second, is not even listed among the top 20 teams.

I never could understand a reason for team rankings in any sport. Now it's apparent there isn't.

It's Time to Clear The Air at Garden

To The Sports Editor:

How many of you are aware of the serious pollution problem at Madison Square Garden? The first time my attention was focused on this deplorable situation was at the Milrose Games in January. It was the first time I had heard a formal request that smoking be suspended during the meet. This was done so that the athletes could breathe oxygen rather than a foul mixture of carbon dioxide and carbon monoxide.

The request was in vain. During the entire night, a haze hung over spectators and athletes. My clothes and hair smelled like they do when I spend an evening at my local tavern.

. I think it is an affront to athletes asked to compete under such conditions. These conditions exist at all other sporting events, save perhaps for the dog show. Since it is assumed that the Garden does not wish to and could not enforce a no-smoking rule, it is therefore its responsibility to provide an efficient exhaust system. In one of the most modern sports complexes in the world, an efficient air-filtration exhaust system seems to be lacking.

What Soccer Needs Is More Exposure

To the Sports Editor:

The entry of the phenomenal Brazilian soccer star, Pelé, into American soccer raised hopes among the followers of the game, and was accompanied by somewhat extravagant claims that at long last soccer—which is, after all, genuine football regardless of what many people say—would take its rightful place on the American sports scene. That was many months ago and so far no remarkable results can be discerned. It is my firm conviction, having observed the vagaries of soccer in the United States for some 60 years, that no individual, even the greatest soccer player in the world, can make this sport nearly as popular as baseball, "football" (a misnomer), tennis, etc. What soccer actually needs is far more publicity and more exposure on TV.

It is deplorable that the United States should lag behind other nations in this, the world's most popular spectator sport, and not be able to offer serious competition in the quadrennial World Soccer Cup, which generates such tremendous interest virtually everywhere.

Big League Baseball: Just a Memory?

To the Sports Editor:

Here's the baseball situation—owners greedy, players greedy. In about five years big league baseball will be just a remembrance—no minor leagues to draw from and the only league left will be the little one. Then when fond parents begin demanding those hundred grand salaries to let the kiddies perform, no Little League. I'm going to miss the game.

Then Green shot birdies on 8, 9 and 10.

Johnny Miller, winner of the Heritage in 1972 and 1974, shot his best round thus far, a 68 for a 54-hole total of 215, or two over par. There he was tied with John Mahaffey (68), Larry Ziegler (71), Bruce Lietzke (71), Tom Kite (72) and Bob E. Smith (72).

Outstanding Play

Following in the wake created by Green's outstanding play, Murphy got to referring to Green as "Calamity Jane." When he was reminded Calamity Jane was the name of Bobby Jones's famous blade putter, Murphy replied, "Well, this kid is putting better than Jones ever did."

"The kid" is rather an odd characterization of a 29-year-old man with a wife and infant son, but actually Green often refers to himself as "the skinny kid from Alabama." It is one way he shows recognition of a personal problem.

Gymnast Posts Perfect Mark

By ROBIN HERMAN

A marvel of exactitude from the moment she sprang off the vaulting horse for a perfect mark of 10.0, 14-year-old Nadia Comaneci of Rumania led the way in yesterday's qualifying round of the American Cup international gymnastics competition.

The finals of the exhibition involving 18 competitors from 12 nations begins this afternoon at 1 o'clock in Madison Square Garden.

Points from yesterday's events do not carry over to today's competition.

Joining Miss Comaneci in today's finals are Kathy Howard of the United States, who was a surprise second-place qualifier, Ilena Davydova of the Soviet Union, Reiko Yoshida of Japan, Zsuzsa Nagy of Hungary and Silvia Anjos of Brazil.

ance in six qualifying events a Soviet teenager, Vladimir Markelov, heads the list of men's finalists followed by Mitsuo Tsukahara of Japan, who completed a stunning qualifying routine on the high bars, his specialty. Other finalists are Andrzej Szajna of Poland, Bart Conner of the United States, Dan Grecu of Rumania and Imre Banrevi of Hungary.

The supremely confident Miss Comaneci, who is ranked first in the world among women gymnasts, regarded this competition as an Olympic warmup—a chance to accustom herself to the rigors of time change and the atmosphere of North America. Her chief rival yesterday was petite Ilena Davydova of the Soviet Union, another 14-year-old with dancing blond pigtails that brushed broad shoulders of which a Pop Warner football player would be proud.

The two girls were spectacular on the uneven parallels, where Miss Comaneci scored a 9.85 and Miss Davydova had a 9.45.

Kathy Howard, a last-minute replacement for Ann Carr of the United States who twisted her ankle Thursday, performed well and finished second behind Miss Comaneci on the unevens.

In the men's competition, the diminutive Andrzej Szajna of Poland, the European champion in the floor exercise, captured his event attaining breathtaking height on his leaps. He went on to turn in strong performances all round as did Vladimir Markelov, an untried 18-year-old from the Soviet Union.

Dan Grecu, world champion on the rings, scored a 9.75 to lead that event with a controlled performance in which th erings barely turned as he flung himself into assorted handstands and crosses.

The ...leaders get a bye and the other eight qualifiers are ranked by their point totals. Then No. 1 plays No. 8, No. 2 faces No. 7, and so forth.

Right now, Buffalo and the Islanders are certain to be one, two among those who have to play the first round, and St. Louis is virtually certain to be No. 8. So if the Islanders do overtake Buffalo, they'll get St. Louis in the first round. If they don't, they may get Vancouver, Chicago, Atlanta, Los Angeles or Pittsburgh.

In the next round, which is a four-of-seven-game series, the first-place teams and the four survivors are again ranked one through eight, and paired in the same manner. Since three of the first-place teams are certain to have better records, the Islanders and Buffalo are certain to be Nos. 4 and 5 on that list and will have to play each other — if they get through the first round.

Standoff With Sabres

Actually, this season, the Islanders have won two road games and lost two home games against Buffalo, but Torrey wouldn't like to press that pattern too far.

Last night, the Islanders were frustrated going into the last period. At Vancouver, they had two early goals disallowed; at Los Angeles, they yielded the tying goal in the final minute despite their insistence that it had been kicked in. In both games, they felt they were being hit with cheap penalties without getting comparable protection from the other side's aggressiveness.

They felt that was happening in Oakland, too. They gave up a power-play goal in the first period after getting caught with too many men in ice during a change. They found Denis Potvin banished for the rest of the game early in the second period for being a barely noticeable "third man in" during a mild scuffle between Westfall and Gary Simmons, the Seals' goalie.

And they found themselves playing shorthanded for five minutes when Jean Potvin drew a major penalty because his high-sticking foul drew blood.

About 90 seconds into that penalty, the Seals made it 2-0 and still had 3½ minutes of man-advantage in which to break open the game. Instead, Henning scored on a breakaway at 15:37, and from that point on the Islanders dominated the game.

A.I.A.W. Final Site Hums in Anticipation

Special to The New York Times

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa., March 27—In this small Pennsylvania town today, there was excitement in the air. The excitement was generated by the tall, agile women who came to town three days ago to do battle on the basketball courts of Penn State University.

"I hear they have one girl who is 6 foot 9 inches," a cab driver said almost incredulously to a newly arrived visitor. "I'd like to get to the final tonight. Folks say those women can play some basketball."

The local Holiday Inn took on a festive air, comparable to the football game hoopla in larger cities, as small celebrations took place in private rooms throughout the hotel.

The stage had been set by Delta State College of Mississippi's victory over Wayland Baptist, and Immaculata (Pa.) College's victory over William Penn in the semifinal round of the Association of Intercollegiate Athletics for Women basketball championship.

The Anticipated Matchup

Now the Delta State and Immaculata women were here for the matchup everyone had anticipated—the nation's top two women's collegiate basketball teams meeting in the final.

"It's what we've all been waiting for," said a petite woman from Cleveland, Miss., the hometown of Delta State. "My husband and I drove up here, just to support the girls. We think an awful lot of them back home."

In the first of two consolation games to decide the fifth and third place winners of the tournament, Tennessee Tech defeated Montclair State College, 94-88, to take fifth place.

Kim Grizzle, a forward, scored 24 points for Tennessee. But the scoring honors of the game went to Carol Blazejowski, a forward for Montclair, who scored 37 points in the game. She finished with a total of 172 points for the tournament, and a 34.2 scoring average.

The estimated 2,200 spectators who were on hand for the first game gave both teams a standing ovation as members of the teams lined up to shake hands following the game.

While Immaculata coasted to an easy 74-52 victory over William Penn in the semifinals, Delta State had to rally to defeat Wayland Baptist, 61-60.

"We defeated a good team and we were lucky to win that one," said Margaret Wade, the Delta coach. "But tonight's game is a different story. We can't play Immaculata the way we played Wayland, because their style of game is extremely different. We'll have to wait and see what happens."

Immaculata, three-time national champions, lost the title last year to Delta. The two have played each other twice this season, each winning at home.

The Mighty Macs have depth, and coach Cathy Rush likes to go to the bench three and four times during a game.

Focus on Miss Harris

"Our bench does a lot for us," said Mrs. Rush. "I can get 30 or 40 points from the bench, and I don't hesitate to substitute."

Delta plays a more patterned offense. The strength of the Lady Statesmen is 6-foot-3-inch all-America center, Lusia Harris, who is averaging 33 points and 19 rebounds per game.

"We like to get Lusia on a low-post under the basket and go to her," explained Mrs. Wade. "Lusia has been picking up fouls early in the game, but we just keep her in there until she can get the feel of her game."

Mrs. Wade was captain of the Delta State team in 1932, the year women's basketball was abolished at the school. Three years ago basketball was reinstated, and has since been the only game in town.

Every home game has been a sell-out, and an estimated 1,000 residents of Cleveland traveled over 600 miles to be at the Penn State Recreation Center tonight to cheer for their team.

"When Immaculata broke our 51-game winning streak in February, the townspeople greeted us at the Memphis airport, complete with a police escort to Cleveland," recalled Mrs. Wade. "It's difficult to put into words what it means to have an entire town behind you. I know it has been an incentive to the team."

Although Immaculata has never played at Penn State prior to the playoffs, they do hold a slight home-court advantage in that they are playing in their home state.

"I think they'll get a lot of sympathy from the Penn State," said a male student who was waiting on line for tickets outside the recreation center. "But it's going to be a good game regardless of who wins."

Red Smith

3-Year-Olds at Work

HALLANDALE, Fla., March 27—This Florida, this sceptered sandspit, this is where old crocks retire to soak their bones in sunshine, where ballplayers come to sweat ill-gotten gains off the waistline, where young horses are taught the lessons they must learn before setting out to seek the Holy Grail in Kentucky, Maryland and New York.

Sports of The Times

There are horses of all ages here at Gulfstream Park, but the ones that command attention at this season are those that turned 3 on New Year's Day, for only 3-year-olds are eligible for the Kentucky Derby, the Preakness and the Belmont Stakes, the series a horse must win to earn the Triple Crown.

One of the major tests for horses in that class is next Saturday's Florida Derby, and a preliminary to that one was the Fountain of Youth Stakes, which attracted seven starters the other day. One of them, Won't Yield, has not been nominated for the Kentucky Derby and another, Noble Surviver, reared at the post and left his jockey clinging to the superstructure of the starting gate. So, as a trial for Triple Crown candidates, the Fountain of Youth was a five-horse race.

Sonkisser was the favorite, partly because he had won all four of his 1976 starts and partly because he is trained by Steve DiMauro, whose horses win whenever LeRoy Jolley's don't. LeRoy has last year's Kentucky Derby winner, Foolish Pleasure, and this year's favorite, Honest Pleasure; Steve won the 3-year-old championship last summer with Wajima and has the champion filly, Dearly Precious. These days everybody who is anybody, a man remarked in the paddock, wants Jolley or DiMauro to train for him. "Sure," said Conn McCreary, the former jockey. "Nobody wants a loser."

Though Honest Pleasure wasn't in the Fountain of Youth, Jolley was in the paddock scouting potential opposition. He said Honest Pleasure would go directly from the Florida Derby to Keeneland for the Blue Grass Stakes and then on to Churchill Downs. Somebody said Honest Pleasure had been sweating heavily before going out to cream the field in the recent Flamingo Stakes, and LeRoy said yes, the colt always got that way before a big one and so did the trainer.

The Trainer Is a Lady

Sonkisser's yucky name comes from his dam, Frozen Orange. Sunkist would be rejected because it is a commercial brand name, and anyway, Sunkist oranges come from California. In his first start last October, the colt finished second. He ran only twice more times but, getting second money once as a 2-year-old, finishing third both through a disqualification. At a mile and a sixteenth, the Fountain of Youth would be his first race around two turns.

He was getting five pounds from Proud Birdie, winner of the Christmas Handicap at Calder and the Bahamas and Everglades at Hialeah. Proud Birdie had run a mile or more on seven occasions and the only mark against him was a dull performance in the Flamingo, where he was fifth. Pinkie Henderson, his trainer, is taller than DiMauro and prettier than Jolley. She is a lady, Mrs. Doug Henderson.

The Hendersons bought a few horses about three years ago, started winning right away and were hooked. They now have a breeding farm on Ocala, and a year ago this month Pinkie took out a trainer's license. Proud Birdie, son of the Kentucky Derby winner, Proud Clarion, is owned by her mother-in-law.

United Press International

LeRoy Jolley
Scouting potential opposition

"We walked him for half an hour this morning," the trainer said of her husky colt, "and he's bursting with energy. This is the first time we haven't galloped him or blown him out on the day he was racing. We are trying something else new, keeping him closer to the pace than he was in the Flamingo."

Riding Lesson

Another in the field, Market Fever, looked like a sleeper. He won his first race by 10 lengths last July at Hollywood Park and was leading in the Hollywood Juvenile Championship when he suffered bucked shins and faded to seventh. Rested more than seven months, he was shipped to Florida and won an allowance race here by seven lengths. The question was not whether he had speed, but only how far he could carry it.

The answer was about five-eights of a mile. He led to the far turn, with Braulio Baeza saving Sonkisser in second place and Jack Fieselman third aboard Proud Birdie. Leaving the backstretch, Sonkisser moved to the front without urging and Proud Birdie went after him around the turn.

In the stretch Proud Birdie got the lead by a head, maybe a neck. He looked like a winner, and in that event there might have been a foul claim, for under Fieselman's right-handed whipping he brushed Sonkisser twice. Baeza tapped his mount once, then settled down to a hand race. The last 40 yards made one point clear: Baeza empty-handed rides better than Fieselman with a whip. It was Sonkisser by a head.

If they had exchanged jockeys, the chances are the result would have been reversed, but that wouldn't have wiped out the memory of Honest Pleasure galloping home in the Flamingo 16 lengths ahead of Proud Birdie, with Baeza as close to laughter as a graven image ever gets. Better look elsewhere for a challenger. To Bold Forbes, maybe? Zen? Telly's Pop? An Act? Johnny Appleseed? We'll see.

Messersmith Is Key to Free Agent Market

manager of the Mets, declined to say what he had offered for Messersmith. He did say it was "a fair offer, but less than we are prepared to offer Tom Seaver." And while the Mets were were playing the Detroit Tigers today in Lakeland, the unsigned Seaver was preparing for this second pitching appearance next Tuesday and clinging to his own demand for three years at $825,000.

Seaver has won 168 games in nine summers with an earned-run average of 2.48; Messersmith has won 112 games in eight summers with a 2.65 average. That is, they allow about 2½ runs a game and, since pitching is the heart of baseball, pitchers are becoming the heart of the revolution. It began, in fact, when Catfish Hunter won his freedom from the Oakland A's last year and auctioned himself to the New York Yankees for $3.75 million for five seasons.

Bidding War Sought

The Yankees also have bid on Messersmith, leading to speculation that Osmond was attempting to stoke the market by getting the two New York clubs into a bidding war. But the offers so Catfish Hunter level, so Osmond was still talking with the San Diego Padres, St. Louis Cardinals, Atlanta Braves and two of his client's former employers, the California Angels and Los Angeles Dodgers.

"The Met's money offer of $175,000 is fine," he said, "but we want up-front money, too. Messersmith is not another Catfish Hunter case, and we're not looking for that kind of money. But he is the only experienced free agent available at this time."

Bonus Offer Wanted

The Mets clearly did not want to pay a king's ransom for Messersmith and thereby raise Seaer's price too. But they also did not want to see either unsigned pitcher wind up in their own backyard with the Yankees. So while the 24 club owners were sharing a common interest in keeping prices down, they also were sharing a common fear that they might lose control of the players' market as baseball entered the era of the free agent.

"I telephoned Osmond from a booth in a gas station in Fort Lauderdale," said McDonald, remembering how the Mets had responded to both the opportunity and the problem. "His only reaction was: No bonus?"

"We made an offer after Mr. Busch got angry at the other owners," an official of the Cardinals said, referring to August A. Busch Jr., owner of the team. "He felt they were giving away too much in the labor negotiations with Marvin Miller.

Yanks Beat Royals In Brett Bros. Act

By MURRAY CHASS
Special to The New York Times

FORT MYERS, Fla., March 27—The Brett Brothers put on an act today that was worthy of a much larger stage, Yankee Stadium, perhaps. But they had to be content to do it before a tiny although appreciative crowd of 3,645 in this rapidly growing city on Florida's west coast.

For the first time since their boyhood days, Ken Brett of the Yankees and his brother George of the Kansas City Royals faced each other on a baseball field. Ken is a pitcher and George a hitter.

In the sixth inning Ken pitched the ball as fast and as hard as he could at this time of the spring, but George hit it harder. The ball sailed over the right-center wall and landed about 425 feet from the plate for a homer.

"He never hit me that hard, even when he was 11," Ken said later.

The Yankees went on to win the game, 6-4, but the outcome was overshadowed by the little drama that had the crowd roaring with approval. Even Ken was able to appreciate the moment. After the homer, he went to the plate and shook his younger brother's hand "just to let him know there were no hard feelings."

When Ken threw the first pitch, George wasn't sure what to think.

"It was a vicious, vicious slow hook," Ken said of his slow curve.

"When he threw that pitch," George said, "I though it was going to be a joke, but I wanted to be serious about it."

Ken was serious, but after he had fallen behind, 3 balls and 1 strike, he had to throw a fast ball over the plate.

"I didn't want to walk him," said 27-year-old Ken. "He never would've let me live that down, either."

Said 22-year-old George, "I just wanted to hit the ball someplace."

As Ken walked toward the dugout after having retired the side—"I didn't even want to go in there"—the Yankees, led by Manager Billy Martin, left the bench and walked away. Ken laughed, able to appreciate the humorous gesture.

"I thought you were going to knock him down and then go fight him," Graig Nettles said to Ken a little later.

"Did you knock him down?" asked Dock Ellis, who didn't see the happening.

"Knock him down? grumbled Ken. "He took me out."

Ken left the family's California home to begin playing professional ball when he was 17. George was only 12 at the time. Their teams had trained in the same area before, but they had never faced each other. In George's first two years in the majors, he was in the American League and Ken in the national. Then Ken was traded to the Yankees.

"We're very close," Ken said. "We talk on the phone at least once a week. We've been kidding all winter about what would happen when we faced each other the first time. I'm glad it happened down here."

The Yankees made the three-hour bus trip here from Fort Lauderdale this morning, but Ken drove across the state last night so he could see George. They had dinner together and George picked up the check.

Ken, though, was ready to spend money on a telephone call.

"I have to call my parents in California before he does," Ken said. "I'll tell them, 'I don't know what you heard, but let me give it to you straight.'"

A moment later, he added, "Hey, was the game on radio back to New York?"

Told it was, he said: "My grandmother probably was listening to it. She lives in Brooklyn. My aunt lives there, too. I have relatives all over the place there."

For the day, though, the focus was on the brothers in Fort Myers. George is the best-looking young third baseman in the majors and Ken is coming back from arm trouble with Pittsburgh.

Ken, who became the youngest player to pitch in a World Series in 1967 when he was with Boston, didn't allow any other hits or base runners in his three innings of pitching.

BACK IN HARNESS: Ron Swoboda, who played for the Mets and Yankees rently a sports broadcaster for WCBS-TV, at the Mets' farm club's trainin St. Petersburg, Fla., yesterday. Swoboda has taken a leave of absence fro vision job to attempt a comeback with his former team.

Flyers Tie Bruins on Leach Goal

BOSTON, March 27 (UPI)—Reggie Leach's 58th goal at 13:47 of the final period today lifted the Stanly Cup champion Philadelphia Flyers to a 4-4 tie with the Boston Bruins in a battle of National Hockey League division leaders.

The tie left the Bruins one point from clinching the Adams Division crown. Philadelphia already has wrapped up the Patrick Division title.

After the Bruins had iced the puck, Bobby Clarke won a face-off in the Boston end, took the puck into the corner and passed to Leach 25 feet in front of the goal. Leach blazed a wrist shot through the lees of the Boston goalie, Gilles Gilbert.

About two minutes earlier, Wayne Cashman scored his second goal of the game to put Boston ahead, 4-3. The left wing pushed in a rebound of his own shot from a scramble in front of Bernie Parent.

Tigers Rout M 4th Straight L

Special to The New York Times

LAKELAND, Fla., March 27—A five-run first inning, at the expense of Craig Swan, was all the Detroit Tigers needed today to deal the Mets their fourth straight defeat, 10-5. The Mets have not won an exhibition game this spring.

Swan, one of the candidates for the Mets' fifth spot in the starting rotation, was hammered for five hits in the first when the Tigers sent 10 men to the plate. The big blow of the inning was a two-run homer by Ellie Rodriguez.

Rusty Staub, who set a Met record last year by driving 105 runs and then was traded to Detroit, drew three walks in four trips in his first game against his former mates. Staub is hitting .400 for the Tigers this spring.

Jerry Grote provided two of the runs for the Mets. The catcher hit a home run over the left-field fence for one run in the third off Joe Coleman. In the ninth, Grote doubled home another run. Felix Millan singled him home.

Staub Bats In Run

Ben Oglivie opened the Tigers' first with a single and Dan Meyer followed with a single. Willie Horton and Staub both singled for one run. When Alex Johnson hit into a double play, a second run scored.

Milt May kept the Tigers going with a single for a third run and Rodriguez then delivered his home run to make it 5-0.

Ken Sanders was the victim of four runs in the final two innings. The right-hander was clipped for home runs by Oglivie and John Valle in the ninth when Detroit scored three times. Valle, from Bayside, Queens, has had two home runs in four trips to the plate for the Tigers this spring.

Three Players Cut

The Mets made their first squad cuts of the spring when they sent Randy Trapp and Ken Perry, infielders, and Jeff Grose, a pitcher, to the minor league complex at Payson Field for reassignment. Tickets f Welcome Home Americana Hot available at She for the competing teams, the tickets were allotted thusly: 6,000 to the public in a lottery drawn nearly a year ago, 2,838 to Temple University as the host school, 2,000 to college basketball coaches, 965 to the N.C.A.A., 250 to college athletic directors, 937 to the Spectrum and 200 to the media.

"I heard," said Ernie Casale, the Temple athletic director, "that four tickets are being scalped for as much as $300."

Casale had a telephone call yesterday from a gentleman who no longer possessed the tickets mailed to him last May.

"I had an argument with my wife," he said, "and she ripped up my tickets on me. What the hell can you do for me."

Fortunately, the man had kept a memo of the location of his seats. But a doctor in Maryland had put both his tickets and a memo of their location in a safety-deposit box.

"He called last night," Casale said, "In fact he called three times because when I got to my hotel I had three different messages to call him immediately at home."

The doctor's tickets were still in the safety-deposit box and the bank was closed now until Monday morning.

"But this morning," Casale said, "I had time to go to my office and dig up the location of his seats."

Ernie Casale stayed at a downtown hotel last night with this wife, Ann, rather than in their suburban home.

"And she forgot her ticket, too," the Temple athletic director said. "She was afraid to tell me at first, but then she had to or she wouldn't have a ticket. But she was all right. I knew where she was sitting."

were running faster and shooting much better than Rutgers. hTey took adantage of steals and other Scarlet turnovers and moved to a 12-point lead with 7:48 remaining in the half. Each team was beginning to move faster and one result was more frequent turnovers.

Michigan increased its margin to a surprising 46-29 at halftime. This was the biggest halftime decifit for Rutgers all season, and the 29 points were the fewest it had scored in the first half of any game.

Rutgers' major problem was its shooting. It hit only 27.5 percent (11 of 40) in the half. The Wolverines, however, hit 18 of 37 for 48.6 percent.

Green's amazing quickness got Michigan the first 2 points of the second half. The little guard intercepted a pass at its source under the boards and flipped the ball to Phil Hubbard for an easy basket. Then Hubbard added a basket and the Michigan lead soared to 21 points.

Ed Jordan drew his fourth personal foul after 5½ minutes of the second half, adding to Rutgers' problems. Within seconds, Sellers committed his third foul and the road became harder for the Scarlet Knights.

But Green was hit with his fourth personal just after Sellers's fourth, so the Wolverines had to bench their quickest men. However, Rutgers was too far behind for Young to remove Sellers or Jordan at that time.

The Wolverines still had a 21-point lead with 12½ minutes remaining.

John Robinson, was scored 14 points for Michigan in the first half, was winning the war under the boards. The 6-6 junior took 11 rebounds in the half, five more than Sellers, the top Rutgers rebounder at that stage. Sellers had only 3 points in the half, hitting only on of seven shots.

Foreman Is Insisting He Is Smarter Now

Before he met Muhammad Ali in Zaire in October 1974, George Foreman represented a mass of invincibility.

No longer unbeatable, and humbled by a pair of embarrassing showings on national television, Foreman can only insist he has "the heart of a lion."

"What you saw against Muhammad Ali was the 'young' George Foreman," the 27-year-old former heavyweight champion said recently. "Now I'm the 'old' George Foreman and I'm probably at my best. I'm a lot smarter than I was then. For one thing, I know what it is to lose, and I like winning a lot better."

Unfortunately, many boxing experts feel that the Ali fight may have inflicted irreparable damage to Foreman's confidence and ego.

In an effort to prove his loss to Ali was a fluke, Foreman participated in "the Toronto travesty," in which he fought five fighters in one day, appeared grossly out-of-shape and boxed amateurishly.

After more than a year's layoff from solid competition, Foreman returned this January against Ron Lyle in Las Vegas and had to climb off the canvas twice in the fourth round before scoring an unimpressive fifth-round knockout.

"That thing I did in Toronto was the worst thing I did in my career," Foreman admits. "But the Lyle fight was really good for me. It was a telling fight. It told the boxing world that George Foreman has the heart of a lion."

"Something happened in that fight that never happened before. Suddenly, I was coming off the floor. In the past it had always been the other guy. It was something I didn't know I could do. Now I know the worst thing you can do is knock me down.

"Actually, I'm glad the fight went that way because I was having trouble getting fights before that. And I have to stay active against good fighters to become the champ again."

With that philosophy, Foreman recently signed to fight Joe Frazier, another former champion, some time in late May or early June. In their January 1973 bout, Foreman, then no more than a muscular, unproven fighter, sent Frazier reeling to the floor six times in two rounds to strip him of the crown.

Mazda Misconception #3

The rotary engine is not as dependable as the piston engine. TRUE or FALSE?

That's about as false as you can get. In America's two endurance classics a '76 Mazda Cosmo, with a standard rotary engine, won its touring class and really showed its durability. The 24 Hour Daytona and 12 Hour Sebring were so tough that half the cars didn't even finish. Yet, in both races, the rotary engine Mazda not only won its class but also finished ahead of Porsches, BMW's, Corvettes and Datsun Z. And at Daytona, the rotary engine Mazda made the fewest pit stops in the race. The rotary is a winner. Doubt it? Drive it.

Cohen

Cohen, 34 years old, is not chic; he is almost bald. He is a North African Jew, a bar owner who is not always a shrewd operator, diplomacy is an afterthought to him. He is a charmer one moment, a frowning fighter the next; a man who wants to be loved, but has a habit of saying the wrong word at the wrong moment.

Cohen is the Jean-Paul Belmondo of the ring, the antithesis of the image of a French hero, a nonromantic off the streets of Casablanca. All those liabilities can be overcome tomorrow night with one good left hook.

"Above all, I want to win the title for France," says Cohn, when he wants to charm. Above all, he wants to win the title for himself to show bourgeois France that it was wrong in rejecting him and his style.

"France has been waiting for a middleweight champion since Cerdan," says Cohn, pulling out the name of another Casablancan. Marcel Cerdan, winner of the title at 33 and later killed in an air crash, was France's much-sought post world war II hero.

Cohen emigrated to Paris in the early 1960's, when his parents left Moroco for Israel. He said it was tough for a North African Jew arriving alone in the big city, and de ended up doing the job he knew best—fighting. Before leaving Moroco, he had become the only Jew to win a gold medal in the Pan-Arab Games.

Since turning pro in 1964, he was compiled a 37-9-9 won-lost-draw record, including a standoff with Emile Griffiths, the former champion, and a knockout over a fellow Frenchman, Jean-Claude Bouttier, the last victory earned him a chance at the title and a big payday.

The bout with Valdes was arranged for last April in Grenoble. But or its eve, Cohen got tendonitis in an elbow and called it off.

Thanks to NBC television, which is airing the bout, Cohen will make $60,000, only $10,000 less than Valdes.

Cohen had to wait a year because Valdes had to recuperate from a broken right hand suffered in a car accident. Both fighters say they are healthy now.

Cohen says he feels bad only because his parents are too old to make the trip here from Israel for the occasion.

the controversial but resilient mayor of Montreal. Six years ago, Mayor Drapeau promised to stage a self-financing "modest" spectacle for no more than $300-million. The price tag now figures to reach an immodest $1.3-billion or more, leaving a deficit of at least $900-million.

And yesterday the Montreal Star reported that Mayor Drapeau and the architect blocked proposals that could have cut at least $146 million from the costs. The Star said that "unbending devtin" to the original plans added expense and delayed the timetable.

Most of that red ink presumably will have to be blotted up by the French-oriented citizens of Montreal and the Province of Quebec. The Provincial Government took over management of the construction from Montreal last November when it appeared the Games might have to be postponed or shifted to another country.

Main Stadium Is Problem

Now, as the Games approach, various investigations into alleged corruption and mismanagement are being put on stand-by while Montreal prepares to smile the way few other cities know how.

Words of praise instead of criticism can now be found in the city's five French-language and two English-language newspapers.

"The Montreal papers were calling it a catastrophe," said Rousseau. "They said we'd have to run the track and field competition at the baseball park. They said the Olympic Village would never get built. They said there wouldn't be any bathrooms at the stadium. They'd say anything to sell papers. Of course we'll have sanitary facilities for the public at the stadium. We're in Canada, not Pago Pago."

The boss of the Organizing Committee, the key group here known as "COJO," pointed out that existing facilities such as the Forum would be used at 17 of the 21 competitive sites—as planned from the beginning.

"Just about everything is ready right now except the main stadium," he said. "We have one problem. If we had 21 problems, it would be something else."

On the positive side, all but the finishing touches have been completed on the velodrome, a stunning architectural triumph where cycling and judo will be held. Pre-cast concrete was the material used in this undulating building, as it was in the nearby main stadium and swimming center. The entire complex carries a current price tag of $800-million.

The New York Times

Construction continues at the swimming complex in Montreal. The main competition pool is filled with water as workmen check for leaks.

Housing Units Progress

An on-time finish can be seen at the swimming center, which forms part of the base of the leaning mast that was to have towered 525 in the air over Olympic Stadium. The mast will rise only 165 feet, barely above the rim of the stadium. Naturally, there will be no retractable roof to be folded and unfolded like a handkerchief on cables extending from the top of the mast. But this won't affect the swimming center. Tiling of the various pools is expected to completed in about two weeks.

The green light also is on at Olympic Village, where 11,000 athletes and other delegation members from 135 nations will live. Of the 980 apartments in the four 19-story, half-pyramid buildings, 600 have already been furnished. The rest supposedly will be done by May 15, along with 224 "lodging modules" that will be set up on the ground floor and in the basement.

As Rousseau conceded, the main stadium is the main problem. Canada has never had a crowd of more than about 35,000 at a stadium sporting event, and Olympic Stadium will seat 58,000 and stand 12,000 for a total of 70,000. Like all the other sites, it is scheduled to undergo a full-scale competitive rehearsal on June 26 and 27. Track and field competition involving Canadian athletes will be staged at the stadium, and the organizers hope for a capacity crowd to test the facility. First they have to finish it.

Rousseau remains confident sod, he said, would be cut end of April from nearby fiel it has been pampered for the As the strips of sod are un form the grass infield of the work will begin on the bas running track.

"Once the base has settled," "you can put a synthetic tra in six days. As long as t me the stadium on June 6, care how it looks."

Little Steel Is Used

Nothing like this radical, stadium, with its 38 giant beams, has ever been built America. The only steel in from the light-weight fixed contained in reinforcing rods sion cables. One feature that most visitors is the extent of overhang. It juts out 100 to from the consoles that anchor ing cantilever beams.

This means most of the will be protected from the But it also means they may watching late-afternoon act the lights. The long overha block sunlight from getting stadium.

The ring in 150-ton segments to th the cantilever beams, circle 165 feet from the ground at point, 150 feet at its lowest.

Great Place to Visi

Canadians from other pa country tend to resent the they will share the blame wit and Quebec for any Olympic ings.

"It's Montreal's party. Qu ty," said a visiting business from Toronto. "They want they got it."

Then, as he listened to French tune washing throug of the Holiday Inn at Pla his voice softened.

"Maybe Drapeau had the after all," he said. "What t would you hold a party that Once you've been here, yo keep coming back."

Hotels Sold Out; Some Tickets Remain

Special to The New York Times

MONTREAL — Tickets for most events in next summer's Olympic Games here are still available, but hotel and motel rooms are sold out.

"People shouldn't get discouraged just because tickets for some of the popular finals are gone," said Ken Farmer, director of ticket sales for the Olympic Organizing Committee. "If they want to come and see something of the Games, they'll be able to get into a lot of good events for sure."

Approximately 4.7-million tickets have been printed in 1,050 categories for 334 different sessions in 21 sports. No tickets are left for the opening ceremonies, the closing ceremonies, most of the track and field finals or any of the swimming or fencing. Only a few remain for gymnastics, at preliminary events.

However, there are still plenty of track and field tickets available, including a few final events. All applicants must now use the following procedure: 1) Write to the COJO Ticket Office, P.O. Box 1976, Montreal, requesting an application form and the latest availability list; 2) Order tickets, enclosing payment and service charge.

Farmer said his group was not aware of any "major" scandal involving the allocation of tickets. He said a Chicago hustler had been exposed after he wrote to Montreal hotels for reservations. In an effort to get rooms he had told customersshe already owned, the Chicagoan assured the hotels he had "thousands of the best Olympic tickets" in his possession.

He had, indeed, ordered thousands of tickets from Montgomery Ward Company, the United States distributor. But an investigation showed he had exactly six tickets to the opening ceremonies, and similar small amounts for other important events.

No tickets have been released yet. To prevent counterfeiting, they will not be distributed until June 1. They are presently stored in the vault of a Montreal bank.

For the opening and closing ceremonies, Canada was allotted 22,000 tickets—decided in a fund-raising "right to buy" lottery. The United States gets 14,234, Britain 1,108, France 990 and Japan 926. The Soviet Union, with few outward-bound tourists, received only 404. Countries such as Zaire and Madagascar got the minimum of 24.

The housing situation is less encouraging than the tickets. Most hotels saved about 25 percent of their space for regular customers, and turned the rest over to the Quebec Lodging Bureau. Single rooms at some of the city's fanciest hotels, such as the Queen Elizabeth, already are pegged as high as $65 a night.

For Olympic visitors who don't already have reservations, the most readily available rooms are those in private homes. Requests for housing of any kind must be made to the Quebec Lodging Bureau, 201 Cremazie Street East, Montreal.

Defense No Longer Problem to Cosmos

By ALEX YANNIS

The New York Cosmos meet the Tornado in Dallas today in a preseason game that has been sold out. The Cosmos have an abundance of defenders this season, competition for starting positions on a team that is gaining popularity which has forced because of the presence of Pelé.

News of Soccer

"This is the first time that I have to fight for a job," said Bobby Smith. He was acquired along with Bob Rigby from the Philadelphia Atoms. Smith is considered one of the best right fullbacks in the league and has played for the United States national team several times.

Ken Furphy, the coach of the Cosmos, had several years of experience in England's First Division. Furphy has been surrounded by good players all of his career, so praise doesn't come easily from him.

After the Cosmos had played their first game under Furphy, the coach couldn't hide his enthusiasm about his defense, which was missing three players he had been counting on heavily.

"The defense played real well," the 44-year-old Furphy said by phone after his team was tied, 1-1, by the San Diego Jaws last Wednesday night. "Bobby Rigby made the only mistake in the game and they tied us, but on the whole I am quite pleased."

Furphy's team played without Dave Clements, Werner Roth and Nelsi Morais, three members of a defense that appears to be the strong point of the team this season.

Furphy had the team working out on the morning of the game against the Jaws and he plans to give the team a slight workout this morning as well before they meet the Tornado at Southern Methodist University.

In addition to moving the Brazil-Italy game from the Yankee Stadium to the Yale Bowl, the United States Soccer Federation is considering changing the site of the England-Italy game on May 28, according to Gene Edwards, the president of the federation and sponsor of the Bicentennial tournament.

"It's a shame to have to move an event of this magnitude," said Edwards, "but we can't take a chance on having a baseball team postpone an event that will be carried on television in many places in the world."

The Yankees have the option to postpone a game four hours before kickoff. The Italy-Brazil game was scheduled for Memorial Day and the Yankees don't play at the Stadium until five days later. The Yankees had been assured by the federation that they would fix the field if it was damaged.

At least one fan hasn't been bothered by the change of sites. James Krigos of New York said: "I don't care if they put the Italy-Brazil game on the moon. I will do my darndest to get there."

The Cosmos are not the only team in the North American Soccer League to acquire stars. The San Antonio Thunder announced yesterday that Bobby Moore, the man who has played more times for the national team of England than anyone, would play with the Thunder against the Cosmos in an exhibition game on Wednesday night.

Moore, known as the Golden Boy of English Soccer, will be a guest of the Thunder before he signs a contract. Moore, who will arrive in San Antonio today, will leave after the game Wednesday to fill prior committements with Fulham, the team that owns his contract. He will be on loan to the Thunder, who open their N.A.S.L. season April 14 against St. Louis.

The Boston Minutemen will play four of their N.A.S.L. games at Schaefer Stadium in Foxboro, Mass. The first game there will be against the Cosmos on April 24. The Minutemen's eight other games will be played at Harvard Stadium. They open the season at Harvard against Toronto on April 17.

Skowron's Son Swings a Mean Club

Special to The New York Times

TEANECK, N. J., March 27 —At Fairleigh Dickinson University he is known as Greg Skowron, premier golfer. His athletic identity is separated from the accomplishments of his famous father, Bill (Moose) Skowron, the former Yankee first baseman.

"I didn't want to go through life on my father's coat tails," said the 22-year-old junior. "Don't get me wrong I'm extremely proud of what he did in professional baseball [eight World Series appearances with the Yankees and Dodgers and a 14-year-career batting average of 283]. I'm happy to be his son. I just always didn't want to be introduced as Little Moose or the Son of Moose."

His quest to find his "own sport" prompted the Cliffside Park resident to forgo baseball for golf after his graduation from Bergen Catholic High School.

"I had been playing baseball since I was 8," said the economics and finance major at F.D.U.'s Teaneck campus. "I always had to contend with the built-in pressure of being Moose Skowron's son. I was just a little guy, but still they expected me to hit a home run every time up, just like my dad. I tried to be myself on the field, but it was hard to escape what going on all around you.

"My father came to see me play one game," he recalled. "I struck out for the first and only time during my Little League career and I made an error in the field. Despite everything, I think I was a pretty good player. I had good hands and I swung the bat O.K. But it just got to the point that I wanted to try something new."

Greg turned down golf and baseball scholarship offers from Purdue (his father's university) and the University of Florida, to attend Siena College in Loudonville, N. Y.

Bruce Pomerantz

"A lot of my friends thought I was nuts when I didn't go to Purdue or Florida," he said. "But I didn't want to get the scholarship because of my father's pull. I wanted to get through college on my own merits."

After a year and a half at Siena, Skowron transferred to F.D.U. and he quickly established himself as one of the Knights' top varsity golfers.

"Greg played in the number one or two position for us all last spring," said his coach, Bob Metz. "Without a doubt, he has the most potential of any of the golfers on our team. He is dedicated to the game, has a great attitude, and for his size [5-foot-10, 157], he hits the ball a long way.

"I'm expecting superb results from him this season. He has an excellent chance to win the individual title at the Metropolitan Collegiate championships in May. His abilities are that great."

Greg, whose average round of golf is in the mid-70's, will be graduated next January. He wants to enter the business world, but he also plans to participate in state amateur golf tournaments and some day become a resident pro.

"It's not that easy to become "a golf pro," Greg said. "There are thousands of golfers and not that many jobs available. My first concern is to get a good job and make money, but if the right opportunity does come along, I'd jump at the chance to spend the rest of my life at a club."

Connecticut's Rowe Selected Top Coach

STORRS, Conn., March 27 (UPI)—The University of Connecticut Coach, Dee Rowe, has been chosen New England coach of the year by the National Association of Basketball Coaches of the United States.

His team's late-season surge into the N.C.A.A. east regionals won the award for Rowe.

said "The World Cup is just what this sport needed. The winner of this series can really consider himself a champion."

Rosi Mittermaier of West Germany gave added support to such a stand last month after she had won two gold medals at the Winter Olympicss at Innsbruck, Australia.

"I know the Olympics are important," said Miss Mittermaier at a postrace press conference. "But I consider the World Cup much more important. After all, the Olympics represent single disciplines. The real world champion is the one who can be best all season long."

Miss Mittermaier, who clinched the overall World Cup title at Copper Mountain, Colo., earlier this month, is expected to retire now that the regular season has ended. She wants to take the opportunity to give testimonials and perform other services that it is said could earn her an income next year that will run high into six figures.

This financial opportunity was not nearly so available when the international skiing set was engaging in scattered competitions in Europe and in the United States in pre-World Cup days.

"There were three important races in Europe," said Lang, who is a writer for L'Equipe, the French daily sports newspaper. "There would be the Lauberhorn in Switzerland, the Hahnenkamm in Austria and the Arlberg-Kandahar, which moved from country to country each year.

Every Man For Himself

"After that, it was every skiing resort for itself. Heads of the ski areas would seek out the coaches of the different teams in an effort to get them to send racers to their competitions. It was a haphazard setup."

Miss Mittermaier's opportunity to profit from her skiing achievements is in keeping with those presented to past World Cup winners. Killy, who was the overall victory in 1967 and 1968 and won three gold medals at the 1968 Winter Olympics in Grenoble, France, is still striking it rich as a result of his credentials.

Karl Schranz of Austria, who led the men's World Cup in 1969 and 1970, is still in the limelight as a result of those championships. Gustavo Thoeni of Italy has been the overall victor four times. It is said he has become wealthy as an "amateur" who is still competing.

Women World Cup champions have not been sought after as much as the men by skiing firms and testimonial-minded organizations. Some of them, nevertheless, have prospered. Nancy Green, of Canada, the World Cup winner in 1967 and 1968, and Annemarie Proell of Austria, who triumphed five straight times before retiring last winter, have earned considerable money as a result of their titles.

"In contrast," said Lang, "look at some of our more recent Olympic gold medal winners. Their achievements are all but forgotten. In this group would be Francisco Fernando Ochoa of Spain, who won the gold medal in men's slalom in Japan in 1972, or Marielle Goitschel of France, who was the women's slalom winner at Grenoble.

John Fry, the editorial director of Ski Magazine, one of the sport's two major publications in the United States, had this view.

"If you look back over 10 years, you have to conclude the World Cup has really been the salvation of international racing. Essentially, this series has pulled the separate races into a series that builds to a climax. It also sets the stage for the Nations Cup as a good yardstick to measure the strength of the different nations."

Is the World Cup here to stay? Lang says that scores of bids from skiing villages and cities throughout Europe have to be turned down each year "because the season is not long enough."

He estimates that the competitors travel about 30,000 miles each year to keep their racing appointments on three continents. He maintains their "weary bones" can be expected to withstand bumps and hazards of ski racing, but not more lugging suitcases and ski gear more than they are now doing.

The Tennis Clinic

How to Avoid Those Nagging Ailments on Court

By CHARLES FRIEDMAN

Do you get a pain in your elbow when you play tennis? Aching shoulder or back? A sore wrist or a sprained ankle? The best thing to do is try to prevent such ailments, according to a leading "tennis doctor."

Dr. Irving Glick of Great Neck, L.I., is the orthopedist for the New York Sets and the Port Washington Tennis Academy, which trains about 700 juniors. He is also an avid player, hardly missing a morning on the courts. He has treated tennis players for about 20 years.

Prevention is the theme he stresses. And one of the keys to prevention, he says, is stretching exercises.

"Loosening up the muscles before a match can avoid trouble," he says. "The muscle is like a rubber band. In a youngster it stretches easily and is less apt to break. In an adult it gets dried and is less resilient."

Warm Up Gradually

After stretching, he says, warm up gradually on the court, hitting easy forehands, backhands, overheads and volleys. "Don't start pounding in your serve right away," he urges. "That is a dangerous area. Hit a lot of practice serves, first flat, then with spin; and speed them up gradually.

"Of course, indoor courts are rented usually by the hour and a player is eager to start. But he would be wise not to rush into action. Inadequate warmups are a leading cause of ailments."

Tennis elbow is among the most common ailments. It can take the form of tendonitis, bursitis or a muscle tear. According to Dr. Glick, it stems from using a racquet that is too heavy or stroking the ball improperly. He recommends switching to a lighter racquet and learning the correct way to hit.

"Many years ago the best players were using heavy racquets to get a weightier stroke," he says. "Now look at what's happened. Many have come up with tennis elbow and, as a result, they are going to light racquets—13 ounces or so. There is less strain on the muscles and their careers are being prolonged."

Some cases of tennis elbow, though, remain a mystery. Stan Smith, for instance, has had one for a year and it has cost him rank and prize money.

"Wearing a bandage will reduce the strain on the elbow," says Dr. Glick. "But it shouldn't be too tight. You can still play if the pain is not too great. I recommend hitting only forehands for the first few minutes of the warmup to 'prime' the elbow; it is usually more painful to hit a backhand.

"By the way, you will rarely see a case of tennis elbow in a player with a two-handed backhand. That kind of stroke takes a lot of pressure off the elbow."

Dr. Glick emphasizes the need for wearing well-made tennis shoes to avoid sprains and "tennis toe." Shoes worn out at the heel, loosely tied, too large or too small, he warns, can bring trouble.

"In a small shoe the toe bangs up against the tip and causes irritation," he says. "In a large one the foot is moving around and in danger of twisting unexpectedly.

"In the matter of supports, foam rubber helps ease the jarring factor, especially on a hard court. It lessens the chances of hurting the Achilles heel, the ankle or knee."

At the Port Washington Tennis Academy the boys and girls make use of an elaborately equipped gym installed by the owner, Hy Zausner. "Gym exercises are important to build up a youngster's muscles and endurance power," says Dr. Glick, who occasionally uses the gym for a workout.

The Great Zacchini, a human cannonball, will perform between the fifth and sixth races and then the Quassars, high-wire artists, will be seen between the sixth and seventh races. Wandering through the clubhouse and grandstand areas will be a Mexican mariachi band, a Polish polka trio, a barbershop quartet and Italian folk singers.

The feature race will be the $2,000 Salute to Labor Pace.

Monticello will be open for 169 programs until Sept. 12 with racing every Sunday afternoon except Easter Sunday, April 18.

On each card, perfecta betting will be offered on the fifth and seventh races, and trifecta betting on the third and 10th.

Boat Show Profitable

Business was good at the 66th National Boat Show held in the New York Coliseum. Total sales were estimated at $71.2 million. Sales of boats were more than $54 million. "The nine-day New York show was a shot in the arm for the industry," said the managing director, Frank Scalpone.

If you're left in limbo between a Mercedes-Benz and the usual Detroit status symbol, Lancia offers you the intelligent alternative.

There are many people who'd love to own a European grand touring car like the Mercedes-Benz. Unfortunately, such cars are incredibly expensive. And therefore most people have to stifle their desires and settle for one of Detroit's mass-produced status symbols. Fortunately, there's now an intelligent alternative. A luxury, performance car at a realistic price. It's the new Lancia.

Lancia is probably an unfamiliar name to you. But that's to be expected. Because very few Lancias have ever come to this country.

But in Europe, Lancia is one of the oldest and most respected car manufacturers. And it's now a division of Fiat.

The new Lancia is the Lancia Beta. And it comes in two body styles: a Coupe and a 4-door Sedan.

It's powered by a highly responsive 4-cylinder, twin overhead cam engine that's extremely reliable and doesn't require constant maintenance. And it's coupled to a 5-speed overdrive transmission. So the engine can run more efficiently with less wear and tear at highway speeds.

Pulled rather than pushed.

The Lancia Beta also has front-wheel drive. So instead of being pushed through twists and turns by the rear wheels, you're pulled through by the front wheels. The advantage of this is better traction in snow or on wet, slippery roads.

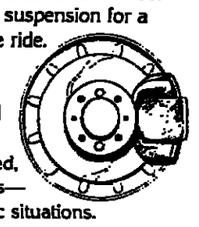
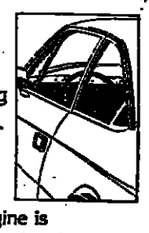
What's more, the Lancia Beta comes with rack-and-pinion steering for precise control. 4-wheel independent suspension for a smooth, sure ride. And power-assisted disc brakes on all wheels for well controlled, straight stops—even in panic situations.



Unhurried European craftsmanship.

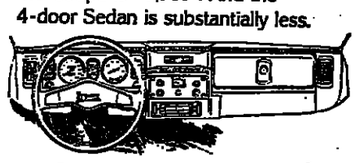
The inside of the Lancia Beta is equally impressive. The front bucket seats are fully reclining, and in the Coupe, are upholstered in real leather. There's also an adjustable steering column, an electronic clock, and thick, plush carpeting.



And since the engine is mounted sideways, there's plenty of room for passengers and their luggage.

The big question.

How much does the Lancia Beta cost? A lot less than many people assume. The base price of the Coupe is $7,510*. And the 4-door Sedan is substantially less.



So now that the financial barrier between you and a European grand touring car has been removed, we suggest you visit your nearest Lancia dealer and arrange for a test drive.

We think you'll agree that the new Lancia Beta is the intelligent alternative.

Anderson Repeats As Leading Passer

Ken Anderson, quarterback of the Cincinnati Bengals, became only the third player in National League Football history to win successive passing titles and, with Minnesota's Fran Tarkenton, dominated the league's passing statistics in 1975.

According to figures released yesterday, Anderson joined Cecil Isbell of the 1941-42 Green Bay Packers and Milt Plum of the 1960-61 Cleveland Browns in taking N.F.L. passing honors for the second straight year, based on the league's rating system which employs the average gain per pass and percentages of completions, touchdowns and interceptions.

Tarkenton was second in the league and first in the National Conference in passing. He was also second in total yards with 2,994 to Anderson's league-high 3,169.

Threw Most Passes

Tarkenton topped Anderson in two other categories. In each of those cases, the former New York Giant led the league and Anderson was tops in the American Conference.

Tarkenton threw the most passes, 425 to Anderson's 377, and made the most completions, 273 to Anderson's 228. Tarkenton also tied Joe Ferguson of the A.F.C.'s Buffalo Bills for the touchdown title, each throwing 25 scoring passes.

And with Tarkenton throwing all but 21 of the Vikings' passes in 1975, Minnesota ranked first in N.F.L. team passing. The Baltimore Colts, with Bert Jones and Marty Domres, edged the Bengals for A.F.C. honors.

Billy Kilmer of Washington teamed with Frank Grant on the longest pass completion of the season, a play covering 96 yards for a touchdown against the Giants. Joe Namath of the New York Jets had the A.F.C.'s longest pass, a 91-yarder to Richard Caster against Baltimore.

Namath, however, threw the most interceptions in the league, 28. John Hadl of Green Bay led the N.F.C. in intercepted passes with 21.

101 Hounds to Race in Coursing Op

The lure field trial, or coursing, season in the East gets under way next weekend, when 101 hounds will compete on the grounds of the Vale Vue Kennels in West Chester, Pa.

News of Dogs

The meet is being sponsored by the Delaware Valley Afghan Hound Club and the Borzoi Club of Delaware Valley.

"We have dogs coming from 10 states," said Ann Filetti of West Chester, who was elected a director of the American Sighthound Field Association two weeks ago at its annual meeting in Las Vegas, Nev.

Afghans head the entry, with 40, followed by borzois, 29; Salukis, 13, whippets, 9; Irish wolfhounds, 4, Scottish deerhounds and greyhounds, 3 each.

This is the seventh lure trial to be held on the Vale Vue course and the first in which greyhounds have been listed. All breeds except the Afghans will race on Saturday starting at 10 A.M. The Afghans will compete Sunday at 9:30 A.M.

Among those entered are Rob and Leslie Erbeau's Lilka of Baronoff, the top coursing borzoi in the United States last year, and Gary and Marietta Forrester's Afghan, Tamora's Image of Ali, who, last November, took first place in an A.S.F.A. meet in California. "With an Eastern dog going to the Coast and winning, it showed we really have arrived," said Mrs. Filetti.

Three Afghan field champions owned by Phyllis Roe of Grass Lake, Mich., head a delegation of 10 from the Wolverine State and Illinois.

Bench dog enthusiasts will have a chance to see a champion, Sandina Sayonara, owned by Gail Peek and Glorvina Schwartz, compete against the racers.

The sport is making rapid strides. In 1972, the first club was organized on the Coast. Now there are 75 over the nation, with seven in the Northeast.

Toy dog devotees strutted with pride last weekend in the metropolitan area. On Saturday, a Pekingese, Ch. Yang-Kee Bernard, owned by Mrs. Walter M. Jeffords Jr. of New York and Michael Wolf of Christiana, Pa., who have done so much for the breed, was best of 1,639 dogs in the Bronx and Helen Stern's Yorkies, Ch. Carlen's I. W. Harper and Carlen's Pompier took the brace honors.

The next day at Riverhead, the top-winning Yorkie in the nation last year, Ch. Mayfair Barban Loup de Mer, owned by Ann Seranne and Barbara Wolferman of Newton, N.J., won the silverware.

Anne Snelling's Irish water spaniel, Ch. Oaktree's Irishtocrat, from Ottawa, who was the star of the Florida circuit, headed the cast on the Tar Heel, as well. Dugan, as he is called, was the only double winner of the top award, taking Alamance and Raleigh, the latter, in a field of 1,788. The other victors were Chet Collier's Bouvier des Flandres, Ch. Taquin du Posty Arlequin, Tidewater; the Yorkie, Loup de Mer, Roanoke; Michael Weissman's Sealyham, Ch. Rhoderick of

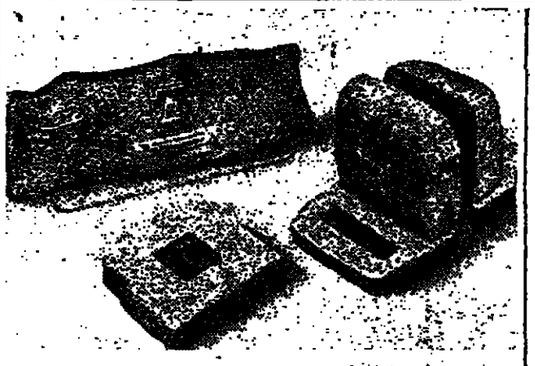
SHOPPING GUIDE



Own a piece of Old Philadelphia!

Bookends, Desk Souvenirs, Plaques — cut from authentic, historic street paving stones of the city where America began! These stones were brought here as ballast in the holds of early immigrant sailing ships. Used to pave old Delaware Avenue along Philadelphia's waterfront, they became part of the city which gave birth to our nation's freedom with the writing and signing of the Declaration of Independence! Unlike mass-produced souvenirs, these are bonafide, limited edition. no two alike. Each numbered and registered. Handsome bronze authentication plate and Liberty Bell ornamentation adds to the natural beauty of the aged stone. Sure-fire conversation pieces, likely to increase in value. Included: story of the stones suitable for framing.
BOOKENDS $27 ea., $45 pr.; PLAQUE w/easel $22; DESK SOUVENIR $12; One of each item $55. Shipped parcel delivery prepaid. Penna. residents add 6% tax. Selling direct only - not in shops. NOW IS THE TIME TO ECONOMIZE

NEW! ARMOR-LIKE SHEATH CAN OUTLAST YOUR MORTGAGE

Inter-Fiber's Super Acrylic is the ultimate Exterior Coating. So good, so durable it has a life expectancy of twenty years.

Chemistry and its space age marvels have finally achieved a liquid protective finish so new, so beautiful, so long-lasting, and so easy to apply it can hardly be classified as a paint product.

Before you buy expensive aluminum or vinyl siding, consider INTER-FIBER'S formulating magic which makes available this miracle coating that provides any building or surface with an armor-like sheath that defies time and the elements. It is unaffected by extreme cold or heat. Resists salt air, alkali, fumes, smog and just plain dirt.

What good is a long lasting finish if it grows dingy and dirty looking? INTER-FIBER'S SUPER ACRYLIC will maintain that crisp, clean appearance years after your neighbor has re-done his house for the 2nd or 3rd time.

JUST CONSIDER THESE FEATURES: Covers up to 500 square feet per gallon. Positive one-coat coverage. Adheres to all surfaces meaning you need only this one product for wood, asphalt, masonry, stucco, brick, metal shingles, roofing, etc. Adheres superbly even to chalking paint or glossy enamels. Actually repels grease and soot. Will not chalk and run down to stain brick and other substrates. Can be applied over wet or dry surfaces. Moisture proofs and damp proofs masonry. Has built-in flexibility. Will not blister or crack even when applied to difficult woods such as yellow pine, fir, or spruce. Locks in stains from "bleeding" woods such as cedar, southern cypress and redwood. Self-priming. Probably the ONLY exterior coating made that has the easy flow and leveling qualities of the finest exterior paints. Will not show brush marks. Can readily be applied by the amateur with professional results. It is so easy it becomes a fun project while saving money.

SAVE HUNDREDS OF DOLLARS and increase your property value as well by using INTER-FIBER'S SUPER ACRYLIC. Applies easily with BRUSH, ROLLER or SPRAY. NO THINNING REQUIRED.

Hood Designs America's Cup Candidate

By WILLIAM N. WALLACE

Ted Hood has designed and Bob Derecktor will soon begin building a new 12-Meter yacht that Hood will sail in next year's America's Cup competition.

The announcement has come from the Hood headquarters in, Marblehead, Mass., and, because of the powerful principals involved, the new boat, yet unnamed, projects itself as a likely defender against a foreign challenger for yachting's foremost prize.

The challenge will come from one of four nations—Australia, France, Britain or Sweden. Those four will sort themselves out in elimination races off Newport, R.I., before the cup event in September 1977.

The New York Yacht Club is the defender. A new club syndicate has emerged from the ashes of the 1974 Courageous group, which directed a successful defense that year against Southern Cross, the Australian challenger. The syndicate's leading assets at the moment are the yacht Courageous, a formidable 12-Meter when last raced 18 months ago, and Hood, the 47-year-old sailmaker, designer and skipper.

It was Hood who took command of the then new Courageous at the last instant in 1974, turned back the thrust of Intrepid in the final elimination race to decide the defender, then routed Southern Cross in four straight races.

The Derecktor yard in Mamaroneck, N.Y., is expected to complete the new aluminum-hulled vessel this summer and the plan calls for her to face Courageous in a series of tuneup match races off Marblehead in August.

The new design is said to be "conventional," meaning that Hood, the naval architect, has resisted any attempt for a breakthrough on a drawing board that Hood, the skipper, may later find objectionable on the race courses. The 12-Meter yacht is not a foreign commodity to the Marblehead mariner who designed Nefertiti for the 1962 defense. She did not get to the cup races, as Weatherly was chosen, instead, to defend against the first Australian challenger, Gretel.

The keel boat technical committee of the International Yacht Racing Union, steward of the 12-Meter class rules, has ordered changes in the boats. There will be closed cockpits and fewer openings in the decks. The big winches — the coffee grinders—will go up on deck rather than below. The goal is added seaworthiness because the 12's of 1974, with their Swiss cheese decks and huge open cockpits, could take in a lot of water and sink.

The changes will not affect the ability of the yachts and it is expected that Hood's new craft will have three cockpits—one for the helmsman his afterguard, one amidships for the coffee-grinder crew and one forward for the foredeck gang. Courageous will not be touched this year, as she is a known quantity against which the new boat can be tested.

A. Lee Loomis Jr., a seasoned yachtsman from Oyster Bay, L. I., whose series of yachts named Northern Light have lived up to New York Y. C. standards, is the manager of the new syndicate. Aiding Hood in Marblehead are Jeff Neuberth, the project director, and Dieter Empacher, co-designer.

Hood's way to the cup defense may not be clear if such skippers as Dennis Conner and Lowell North can find financing to acquire their own 12's. Intrepid, now 9 years old, is in Hawaii and the new owner, Robert Fendler, reportedly has sought Conner as skipper.

Baron Bich, the French yachtsman who tried for the cup in 1970 and 1974, is building a new boat. Pelle Petterson, a designer-builder, is in charge of the Swedish challenge and construction of a new boat is to begin soon.

Nothing concrete has been heard lately from the British, while the news from Australia is that Jim Hardy, the likable skipper of Southern Cross for Alan Bond in 1974, is about to give up his plans to build a boat because of lack of financing. Bond's designer, Bob Miller, has been tank-testing in the Netherlands, but no one is ever sure what Bond may do next.

Scholastic Stars Select King

Six players from New York State are among the 40 selected to the all-America high school basketball team, announced today by Parade Magazine.

Named to the first team of 10 players by coaches, recruiters and writers was Albert King, a 6-foot-6-inch junior from Fort Hamilton High School in Brooklyn. His brother, Bernard King of the University of Tennessee, has been selected to several collegiate all-America teams.

Other New Yorkers selected were Jim Graziano of Farmingdale (L. I.) High School, Wayne McCoy of Long Island Lutheran High School, Larry Petty of Pownounced he will play one more year of high school Tyrone Ladsdon of Canarsie High School and Lowes Moore of Mount Vernon High School.

Named from New Jersey was Michael O'Koren, a 6-6 senior from Hudson Catholic High School in Jersey City.

19 States Represented

The 40-man squad represented 19 states plus the District of Columbia.

Five players were picked for the second year. They were King, Graziano, McCoy, Glen Grunwald of Franklin Park, Ill., and Ron Perry of West Roxbury, Mass.

The consensus of the selectors was that Darrell Griffith of Male High School in Louisville, Ky., was the outstanding high school player in the nation. The runner-up was King, who has announced he will play one more year in high school ball, then declare himself a "hardship" case in hopes of joining the professional ranks.

Other high school players to reach the pros via the "hardship" route are Moses Malone, Bill Willoughby and Daryle Dawkins.

Anti-Pollution Effort Backf

By JOANNE A. FISHMAN

The Boating Pollution Control Committee was formed a few years ago by a group of Manhasset Bay boatmen who were trying to find an alternative to the holding-tank requirement for boats. And they succeeded. But "successs" has boomeranged in Manhasset Bay.

News of Boating

An alternative was approved and the Environmental Protection Agency accepted the use of flow-through treatment devices in navigable waters and restricted holding tanks to lakes. But the E.P.A. also permitted states to apply for a no-discharge zone in certain navigable waters, to protect shellfish beds, among other things.

The irony is that the Nassau County Department of Health is requesting that all boat anchorages in Manhasset Bay be declared a no-discharge area. Going through channels, it means the county has asked the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation to ask the Federal E.P.A. for an exemption.

Late last summer the water quality in Manhasset Bay deteriorated to the point that beaches nearly closed. This prompted a health department survey to find the causes of pollution. The report concluded that boat discharges had a significant polluting influence, and the exemption request followed earlier this year.

The pollution control committee has termed the report incomplete and inaccurate. It also contends the Federal no-discharge zone would drive boating activity out of the bay.

"We fought for—and we got—Federal approval for flow-through treatment devices that are now 100 times more effective than municipal sewer systems. And now this," says Juda Richards, the committee chairman.

Rather than point the finger of guilt at the 2,500 boats berthed in the bay, Richards said the health department should tackle the "real sources . . . the raw sewage from New York City carried in on the tide and the septic tanks leading into the bay."

According to Charles Digney, general manager of Flagship Yachts, Ltd., in Port Washington, holding tanks are an "unnecessary evil. They're a danger on board because of the buildup of methane gas and the ease with which the vents can clog . . . as it is now, even without a holding tank it builds in your lines if you don't use the boat for a week."

Meanwhile the health department wonders what all the fuss is about. "We never intended to make boats have holding tanks," explained a department spokesman. "As we interpret it, a no-discharge zone means you can have flow-through devices but you just can't use them."

Sail and power vessels built before 1940 are invited to attend the Antique and Classic Boat rendezvous at Mystic Seaport in Mystic, Conn., July 31 and Aug. 1.

You think it's all fun being me, Dayton Trubee?

Well, you're right, especially when I travel around as I've just been doing, seeing this beautiful country of ours, looking for boats to buy for my good friend-customers.

I'd like to share with you some special people I visited on my trip, who contribute to the integrity of yachting and its great pleasures.

My first stop was Keyport New Jersey, and a short stay with Eric and Ivan Pederson of Hans Pederson & Sons. They are the builders of the famous Hans Pederson skiffs, probably the finest deep water skiffs in the world.

Next, a short stay at Saugatuck Harbor Yacht Club, visiting a yachtsman and proud owner of a 37' Egg Harbor named Bill Rauch. It was a pleasure going aboard his boat and talking with him about something new in boats that he has in mind.

I had a couple of boats to look at in Essex, Conn. and I stayed the night at the Griswold Inn, seeing Innkeeper Extraordinaire (and young) Bill Winterer, owner of a magnificent 43' Alden ketch. Also, while in town, I visited old-friend Ralph Becker, who has just taken over the Grand Banks franchise for New England, and is also a dealer for Full Sailboats. He and his wife, Sylvia, have their offices at the Lighthouse in Essex. And Palmers expertise as a boatyard owner and boat builder will, I know, be very good for his future customers

These are among the finest of the first stringers that have been in the yachting business for years, and I like to mention them.

About my yard: I still am host to a huge cofferdam that's cut my yard in half. But we got some coffee mess-ups and expect the mess will be cleared up in a week or so.

So, I have a half-yard full of nice boats. Among them are a beautiful 34' fiberglass Trawler; a Ray Hunt designed 42' Fisherman Sedan, diesel; and of course my old friend Ray Hunt designed 52' Offshore Fisherman Yacht.
And other very nice boats.

I'll be back in my yard today, and anxious to see you and talk with you and feed you a cup of coffee. I'm still interested not only in selling boats, but in buying boats, too.

So, if you a buyer or a seller be, or just a boat person who would like to look around, please look in on . . .

Me, Dayton Trubee

"For the drivers, it's much the same," said James Hunt of England, whose McLaren was second only to Patrick Depailler's Tyrrell after yesterday's opening qualifying sessions for the United States Grand Prix West. "It's very narrow here, but it's still not as claustrophobic as Monte Carlo."

"It may be tougher on the cars than Monte Carlo," said Emerson Fittipaldi of Brazil, twice the world drivers champion, "but it may be a little easier on the drivers. At Monte Carlo, there is no place to relax because there is no real straight. Here, there is a short straight so we don't have to concentrate so hard."

That short straight, under its disguise as Shoreline Drive, has a 40-mile-an-hour speed limit most of the year. But today, Niki Lauda of Austria, the world champion, was relaxing at 191.79 m.p.h. on it in his Ferrari. And this is, except for Monte Carlo, the slowest grand prix course in the world.

"It is fantastic," said Fittipaldi. "Imagine, at one point you are going 185 miles an hour, and then suddenly you have to break down to 40 or 50."

"I will listen to the engine to hear what it has to tell me," he said when asked how fast he would do around the streets of Long Beach. "And then I will go as fast as I can, and on faster, just like always."

Top Eastern Crews in San Diego Race

By NORMAN HILDES-HEIM

In years past, as the lakes and rivers thawed, one of the surest harbingers of spring was the reappearance of the college crews. This year, to get a glimpse of the best Eastern crews, one has to journey to California.

The reason for this year's westward migration is a 2,000-meter race known as the San Diego Crew Classic to be held next Sunday. The classic, first rowed in 1973, has come of age as one of the major rowing regattas in the United States.

One of the big attractions for the Eastern crews is the opportunity to practice in San Diego for a week before the race itself. The other attraction is that the regatta is by invitation, which is another way of saying it is free for the invited crews.

"We wanted to have the best regatta in America," said Gary Fraser, this year's regatta chairman, "and to do that we had to have the Eastern crews. To get them, we had to have something different, and the 'Invitational,' as we call it, was dreamed up.

"A group of us got together, organized the regatta, pooled our resources, and then approached San Diego's City Council. Last year the Council provided almost half our budget, but this year they cut their contribution in half.

"It meant raising more privately, but with the success of the previous regattas, we were able to do it. Harvard came out last year and won the regatta. This year, in addition to Harvard, we invited Massachusetts Institute of Technology. M.I.T. apparently has quite a Boston rivalry with Harvard, and they were happy to accept."

Everyone is out to beat Harvard, and the word is that this seems to be the year to do it. Last year's national intercollegiate championship crew, probably the best boat in Harvard's long rowing tradition, has been decimated by graduation. Harry Parker, the Crimson coach, is boating a completely new crew for San Diego.

Washington, the perennial West Coast rowing power, Cal-Berkeley, Washington's chief rival for West Coast honors, the United States Naval Academy and the University of Wisconsin will be among the crews in San Diego to challenge Harvard.

Wisconsin, last year's Intercollegiate Rowing Association champion, is always behind in its training at this time of year. As a bit of an equalizer for the Classic, Wisconsin left Madison on March 20 to get in a week's extra practice before the arrival of Harvard and M.I.T.

Fraser smiled when he said, "We knew the Classic had achieved something when Ted Nash, the University of Pennsylvania's coach, called us and said Penn would pay its own way just to get a chance to race here. Nash thinks this is the year of the Blue and Red, and Penn will be here to get a shot at the best."

The only regatta this year where the best of the East will meet the best of the West is San Diego, and any claim to a national title will have to be established in California.

It's a bit like having dessert before the main course of the racing calendar is served, but San Diego is the only time this season all these crews will be tested in the same race, making victory on Mission Bay that much sweeter.

Hunt Glad to Drive For McLaren Team

By PHIL PASH

Based on what has already happened this season, today's history-making Grand Prix race through the streets of Long Beach, Calif., shapes up as a battle between reigning world champion Niki Lauda of Austria and James Hunt of England. Hunt feels that Ferrari-shod Lauda is the man to beat. "The course is designed to suit Ferrari, with a slow corners and tremendous acceleration areas after the corners," said Hunt. "Given a car that is working well, Niki will be tough because he is driving so well. It's that hard-to-find combination of a car that is working well and a driver who is going well."

About Motor Sports

Even though he tabs Lauda as the favorite, Hunt says he is "not lacking confidence." "We have been going quite well ourselves," he added, referring to the strong McLaren team for which he drives.

Find Victory Is Possible

Hunt has been on the pole for the first two Formula races only to see Lauda win both. In the season opener in Brazil, Hunt crashed and Lauda posted an impressive victory. In South Africa on March 6, Lauda won again as Hunt finished second.

Two weeks ago at Brands Hatch in England, Hunt finally overcame Lauda and won. But it was in the Race of Champions, a non-points evens for Formula One and Formula 500 venue.

"It proved to us that we can beat him," said Hunt, "and after going so well in the early races, but not winning, it gave us a boost."

Last year at this time, Hunt was driving for Lord Alexander Hesket, and everyone was having a high old time, if not winning races. His lordship left Formula One racing at the end of the 1975 season and when Emerson Fittipaldi left McLaren to go with his brother's Brazilian team, McLaren signed Hunt.

"I think it was a real tragedy that Hesketh Racing folded up the way it did," said Hunt. "The company survived but not the race team because we couldn't attract sponsors.

"I really enjoyed my association with Hesketh. We did a lot for racing and proved that you can have fun doing it. Before we came along with the parties, the yachts and all the rest of that, I think some people in Formula One had lost their ability to smile."

Business First at McLaren

McLaren never has been known as anything but a business-first-and-only team, and wasn't it quite a change for Hunt, who has been described as a "breath of fresh air" in Formula One racing?

"Actually, it wasn't as different as I thought it would be," said Hunt. "Many people would have been surprised at the serious side of Hesketh Racing, and the seriouness did not change when I went to McLaren.

"I'm most happy with the team, and I have to believe it is one of the best rides in Formula One. With Emerson helping with the refinement of the car before he left, it was a nice situation for me to step into. Consequently, I have been able to concentrate on areas other than the development of the car."

McLaren this season has been working on an innovation—a six-speed transmission (gear box). Five-sped gear boxes are used in other Formula One cars. "It's a McLaren thing entirely," said Hunt. "They took apart a five-speed Hewland gear box and added another gear. We used it at Brands Hatch, and it helped. But I don't believe it to be the end-all."

With so much attention focused on the Long Beach race, Hunt said "it is terribly important for all of motor racing that this be a good race and a clean race. It could open so many more doors for us."

THE WIZARD OF ALFA

Come drive with me down that yellow brick road to my magic Alfa showroom, where the walls gleam of silver & gold, and in-floor is beautiful illuminated fiber-optic-ing new Alfas in every color over the rainbow. Due to my magic pri ces you will get much less gold here than you will need at any other dealer: I creat miracles by making Alfas affordable, yo can even pay one bit in thirty-six tol moons. I sold Ben Hur great handling Ma rio, sexy Lady Godiva a horse, and th wicked Witch of the West an economica brown. I know I can get a great deal from ing sexy economical Alfa Romeo. Don' throw money away by not checking us out Travel a little, save a lot. Travel a lot, sav even more. Wishing won't help, however I, the Wizard of Alpha will wave my magi pen and make it happen. Nobody Sells Audis For Less. Or Does More To Take Care Of Them.

Nobody's prices are lower than ours. And nobody gives you more for your money.
We give you two showrooms and a block-long service center near your office in midtown Manhattan. It doesn't cost more for that.
We give you the largest inventory of genuine Audi parts on the East Coast. It doesn't cost more for that, either.
Nor does it cost more to buy from a dealership with factory-trained technicians who understand Audis inside and out.
So if you're considering an Audi, consider Porsche/Audi Manhattan. No other dealer gives you more.

Our low price is less than it appears to be.

What's more surprising than our low price is how much more it includes. Like discounts on tires. And discounts on batteries. And coast-to-coast service, too.

A low price is always a nice place to begin. But at Avis it doesn't end there.

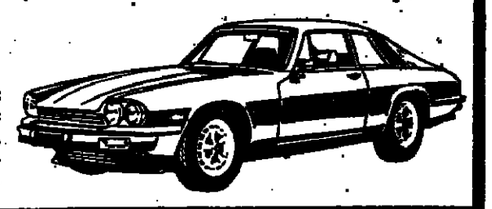
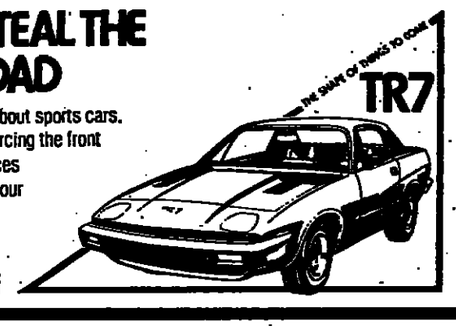
Jaguar presents the superb new XJ-S.



This new breed of cat may well be the best-handling four-passenger car in the world. It has Jaguar's V-12 engine, Jaguar's sports car handling, Jaguar's remarkable luxury. Drive the XJ-S. Soon.

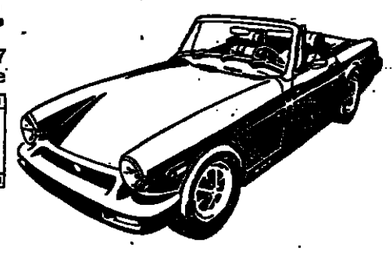
TR7. IT'S OUT TO STEAL THE AMERICAN ROAD



This new Triumph will change your ideas about sports cars. It's bold wedge knifes through the wind, forcing the front down for solid control. It cuts drag, enhances power, adds miles to the gallon. But shut your eyes and you're riding in a luxury sedan. Under it's skin, TR7 is a triumph of simplicity, at a price that's a steal.

TRIUMPH

MG Midget. Where M.P.G. and F.P.G.* come together.



M.P.G. With the MG Midget, it means 37 M.P.G. (highway) and 25 M.P.G. (city). These are estimates, and they'll vary depending on your type of driving, car's condition and optional equipment. But what's F.P.G.?* It's Fun Per Gallon! And Midget has more of it.

The first thing you have to do to get a lot of car for not a lot of money is believe it's possible.

The 1976 Fiat 131 Sedan. $4,431.*

You can't believe that a car costing $4,500 could come with rack-and-pinion steering, a five-speed gear box, front-wheel disc brakes, radial tires, undercoating, tinted windows, door-to-door carpeting, a rear window defroster, an adjustable steering wheel, and complete rustproofing? Plus the room of much larger cars? And the performance of much more expensive ones?

Then before you spend your money on any car, you'd better test drive a Fiat 131.

Because not only is it possible, but all those things come on a 131 with a choice of either two doors or four.

FIAT

A lot of car. Not a lot of money.

*1976 Manufacturer's suggested retail price POE. Inland transportation, dealer preparation and local taxes additional. Car rental, leasing, and overseas delivery arranged through your participating dealer.

We have an automobile that saves like an economy car and drives like a Mercedes-Benz. Experience it. The Mercedes-Benz 240D.

Most economy cars make you economize in areas where you don't want to cut corners. Areas like comfort. Or safety engineering. Or quality. We have an alternative. An automobile that solves your gasoline problems once and for all. but doesn't compromise other essentials in the process.

What is it? The Mercedes-Benz 240 Diesel. A car that uses economical Diesel fuel instead of gasoline. A car that burns each gallon of its fuel more completely than any gasoline engine. A car that never needs a conventional tune-up.

But outstanding running economy is just part of the story. The 240D has all of the safety design and engineering advancements that have made Mercedes-Benz automobiles a standard for the automotive world. On top of that. it has ample room for five adults and their luggage.

Sound too good to be true? See the 240D for yourself. Test drive it. Experience an automobile whose time has come.

Observations on the Mores Of a Social Sub-Group

The social anthropologist Mede R. Pershun has been missing since April 1, 1975, when he was observed streaking from a campground in the Midwest shouting "Sheraton! Plaza! St. Regis!" For several months he had been engaged in a field study of the social sub-group he chose to call Arvee—the owners of recreational vehicles. I have attempted, in the following article, to present his observations and findings. It is based upon Pershun's notes and tapes, which were discovered by a distraught cleaning woman in a California Holiday Inn shortly after the professor's disappearance.

—J. D. REED

Location

The Arvee are found usually in national and state parks, private campgrounds, places called KOA (which may have a religious or political significance) and—off season—in backyards.

Identifying Characteristics

Arvee closely resemble Vacationers; it takes a trained eye to tell the difference.

The males have a deeply tanned left arm; the right one is comparatively pale. This is due to the fact that the males drive all summer, from site to site, with their left arms hanging from open car windows. The Arvee female has exactly the reverse markings, for the female seldom drives, her energy conserved for arduous off-the-road tasks. These markings are helpful, for the Arvee female dresses in shapeless attire and usually wears her hair short. The lack of sexual differentiation in attire may be caused by the Arvee habit of dressing in dark vehicles, where clothing thrown in piles is often mistaken for one's own. (I have, for example, often seen males wearing trousers with zippers on the side.)

Among males, a supporting identification is the wearing of Bermuda shorts with low, brown socks.

The final identification test to recognize an Arvee, male or female, requires the dispassionate reserve of the professional: Smell the subject. The Arvee is redolent of wood smoke, bacon fat, charcoal, Coleman fuel and the pesticide Off! (see Fun & Games). If any one of these odors is missing, chances are you're not sniffing an Arvee.

Shelter

In the vehicles of the Arvee lies the clue to their social, religious and political life. Food-gathering, childbirth, lawmaking, television and canasta take place either in, or directly adjacent to, their vehicles. In this respect The People, as they call themselves, resemble the Romanys of old, the gypsies of the British Isles or the covered wagon pioneers of our own country. There is a myth, even, that when "their time comes," old Arvee drive off to motels to die. Among the vehicles of the Arvee are:

Pickup campers. A house-like metal box is set in the bed of a pickup truck. These vehicles come in an ascending rank of complexity and decoration.

Nations Off the Beaten Track

By ROY BONGARTZ

Do you hear the siren call of faraway places with strange-sounding names? Do you yearn for a vacation off the beaten track, away from the madding tourist crowds? The Micropatrology Society may be able to help; it has the facts on some of the world's most far-out destinations, with strange-sounding names to match.

The Principality of Outer Baldonia, for example, or Shrike Island (S.W.I.), or even the Riparian Palatinate of Lesser Parece-Vela. They are among the 128 tiny private nations catalogued by the St. Louis society. The problem is, the lands on that list are not served by travel agents and airlines. They exist sometimes only as a bit of coral reef or—most often—as a dream in the minds of their founders, fearless individualists who ignore the scoffers to create a world in their own image.

Albert Blaustein, a Park Avenue lawyer and international law professor at Rutgers University, is a student of these self-styled independencies. He sees them as a sign that the "civilized world" is getting to be a progressively worse place to live in. "I don't think the world will ever be as good again as it is today," Blaustein says. "When man set foot on the moon, the world reached its high point. We've been going downhill ever since."

Blaustein is associated with the Micropatrology Society, a group that exchanges information on micronations whose claims to existence have varying degrees of credibility. The society assesses these claims in five categories: B (for bogus), E (for extinct), F (for fiction), T (for traditional) and O (for other). Only the T's and O's give dedicated explorers any hope of coming upon real land.

The Republic of Minerva (O), established in 1972 by a Declaration of Sovereignty by a group of Californians, lays claim to an actual piece of land. The republic consists of two coral reefs 17 miles apart in the South Pacific Ocean some 3,400 miles southwest of Honolulu and 915 miles from Auckland, New Zealand. North Minerva is in the form of a circle four miles in diameter, while South Minerva is in a figure-eight configuration about the same distance from end to end. Nobody had ever claimed these tidal reefs, probably because they disappear under the waves twice a day, until President Morris G. "Bud" Davis, his Vice President and his Secretaries of Interior and State signed the Declaration.

Davis, a former project engineer with North American Rockwell who helped develop the Minuteman Missile System, runs his domain from the living room of his frame house on a shady suburban street in Orange, Calif. "Our first plan is a major landfill program," he announced shortly after founding his republic. Originally it was to attract a population of 60,000 to a fancy ocean resort, "Sea City," that was to "sparkle like a jewel in the blue South Pacific," according to an early issue of the Minerva Times (a two-page monthly paper that goes for $6.25 per copy). Modern 16-story structures following the contours of the reefs and built on stilts would house everybody, who would live with "no taxation, welfare, subsidies, or any other form of economic interventionism."

The main income was to come from the registering of ships. A recognized country, such as Liberia, is free to register ships for whatever bargain fee

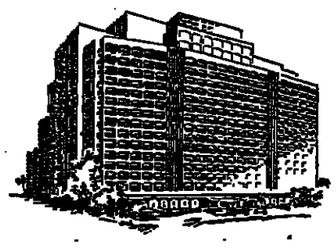
Gracious Elegance

An almost forgotten art is alive and flourishing at a great, new Miami Beach Oceanfront Hotel.

We carry on very old-fashioned ideas about what makes a hotel "great." Ideas that you will find at only a very few of the world's finest hotels. Like personal attention, exclusiveness, genuine hospitality and true privacy.



A lot more refinement, and a lot less hustle and bustle. A beautiful alternative to sharing the nice things in life with sightseers and conventioneers.

Spaciousness, too...plenty of it to enjoy uncrowded tennis, elegant dining in celebrated Bernard's, sunning, relaxation ...and an appropriate place of honour at our Yacht Club for your proud craft.

And, we will give you an apartment for the cost of a room at other establishments.

Gracious elegance lives again.

They call us old-hat.

We just spent a mint redecorating every inch of the Carillon. But behind our beautiful new face, everything is exactly the same as it's been ever since we opened our doors some twenty years back. You bet we're old-hat, and very proud of it.

Our staff? They've been with us for years, and they take special pride in making you feel warmly welcome. (Your waitress may even remember how you like your eggs.) The food? As delicious and plentiful as ever. Extras on your bill? We still don't believe in charging for every little thing. We give you the pool chaise, beach towels, even free golf at the Doral Country Club, and free door-to-door transportation. You get special treatment at the Doral's Starlight Supper Club. And entertainment right here, so you can celebrate every night with us. Free bingo, movies, cocktail parties, canasta tournaments, all kinds of fun.

Maybe it's our old-fashioned ways that keep so many friends coming back year after year. So why should we look around for a new hat?

Mr. Wentland says the club's chief target is the family on a relatively low-cost, short trip. The directory's listings are concentrated in areas that are major destinations for families—31 hotels and motels in the Greater Washington, D.C., area, for example, and several in the vicinities of Disneyland and Disney World.

Members are advised to make reservations in advance to insure getting a room for two nights. At the time they make their reservation they should proclaim themselves TECCO cardholders to get the second night free.

The vast majority of the inns and lodges participating in the program will honor the card, subject to availability, the year round, Mr. Wentland says, but some impose restrictions, such as blocking out the period between the Fourth of July and Labor Day. Included in that minority is the Howard Johnson Motor Lodge at Kissimmee, Fla., which is near the entrance to Disney World. Manager Gordon Jackson says he will honor the free-second-night arrangement only during his less busy months, from September through early December.

William Hoest

"I'm sorry, that's not my table."

Inquiries about the club or applications for membership (with $19.76) should be sent to TECCO, P.O. Box 15364, Fort Lauderdale, Fla. 33318. Cards obtained now will be valid until Dec. 31, 1976. Next year the membership fee is expected to be $20.

RALEIGH?

"There is nothing for the traveler to do in North Carolina during the month of April," begins a press release from North Carolina's State Travel Development Section. The next two words are: "April Fool!"

CRISIS ON CAPRI

The Isle of Capri, in the Bay of Naples, once a magnet for the rich and jaded, is fighting to survive as a tourist destination. In the last two decades the four-square-mile island with its fabled, luminous Blue Grotto has become primarily a one-day side trip from Naples. Nineteen hotels have closed in the last seven years. Capri's tourist authorities recently refused to allow the owners of the Tiberio Palace Hotel to sell its facilities for non-hotel use and have imposed a ban on the closing of other hotels. "The authorities are trying to save as many hotels and receptive facilities as possible while making plans to promote Capri to a newer world of package vacations," says an Italian Government newsletter. "Along with the ban on the future closing of hotels come plans for massive injections of credit to encourage the creation of a modern-day popular tourism set-up side by side with luxury hotels." The island's population of 13,000 depends almost entirely on tourism for its livelihood.

CAMPING IN EUROPE

Camping tours of Europe by motorcoach for travelers aged 17 to 30 have been offered for several years by a London-based company, Continental Coach Tours Ltd., whose trips begin and end in London. This year's series, which begins April 3, consists of six basic tours. The shortest is a three-week trip to seven countries, the longest a nine-week tour that takes in 14 countries and goes as far east as Istanbul. Each coach party is made up of 20

Letters: The Joys of Taking a Slow Boat

To the Editor:

To John Brannon Albright's article about freighters in the Notes Column (Travel Section, March 7), I should like to add a few enthusiastic words about the pleasures of this type of travel.

Five years ago 11 friends and I, four couples and four singles, sailed from Seattle for a 43-day trip to Japan, Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong. To book all of the freighter's passenger space had required well over a year, and our passenger list changed as often as the ship's final sailing date.

On arrival in Inchon, cargo changes extended the ship's Korean stay for 10 days, eliminating all of our itinerary except Japan. We were, however, given air tickets from Seoul to Hong Kong, Taiwan and Osaka, and arrangements were made for us to rejoin the ship in Kobe to sail to additional Japanese ports. At each stop local agents of the line—the American Mail Line—helped us plan our sightseeing, obtaining guides and a minibus when needed.

We were always happy to return to our home afloat with its luxurious staterooms, lounge, game room, a never-needed pantry and fully equipped laundry. There was limited deck space for walking but plenty for sunning, and we were frequent visitors to the bridge.

We were never bored during the 11-day Pacific crossing since we are like those 10,000 freighter travelers Mr. Albright mentioned—people who not only have the time but who love the sea and ships.

ALICE BRINGHURST
Hempstead, L. I.

To the Editor:

One point in the article on freighters could be expanded upon: Not all freighters refuse to take passengers over 79 years of age. Some, such as the Jugolinija, Concordia, Royal Netherlands, Ivaran and Polish Ocean lines, have no age limit, although they, like the other lines, insist on a good-health certificate for passengers over 65.

To the Editor:

We have received much response from the article about freighter travel. However, there is one problem. The story appeared with our old membership subscription rate of $7 a year. Our new fee is $10 a year. It is difficult to ask people for an additional $3, but with inflation being what it is, we feel we must.

RALLY

To the Editor:

There's another side to the story, "Rally: A Sport for Anyone With a Car" by Philip Singerman (Travel Section, March 14). For those of us who live on country roads, the sight, sound and smell of 50 or so cars rumbling by on an otherwise quiet Sunday afternoon are anything but a joy.

These drivers and their cars endanger our children and animals, tear up our roads, and pollute the air. Where is the "sport" in that?

NERVOUS TRAVELERS

To the Editor:

Earl Ubell's article, "Politics and the Nervous Traveler" (Travel Section, March 7), brought to mind the five delightful weeks I spent in Portugal last summer with my family. We traveled through the interior, to the beaches on the Algarve Coast and visited Lisbon and Porto.

In no case did we ever feel that the so-called political turmoil interfered with our enjoyment of the trip. The roads were in good condition and when we traveled by train, we found they were always on time.

A few days after I left Portugal, an acquaintance gave me an issue of one of the leading American weekly newsmagazines. It featured a cover picture of shouting demonstrators in Lisbon's Rossio. The large-lettered caption said: "Chaos in Portugal." I had been present at the very demonstration pictured and found the shouting to be about as menacing as the cheering at an American football game.

If the photographer had angled his camera ever so slightly to the left, he would have caught scores of us ready to sit down after the demonstrators

The Bicentennial Experience Begins in Virginia

This year, Virginia offers three new Bicentennial Information Centers staffed with trained travel counselors to assist you in planning visits to Bicentennial attractions throughout the state.

The Yorktown Victory Center opens April 1 in Yorktown where American independence was won in 1781. Including historic treasures, such as the throne of King George III, the exhibits and film trace the events of the Revolution throughout the colonies, up to victory at Yorktown.

The Western Virginia Bicentennial Center opens April 13 in Charlottesville, only minutes from Thomas Jefferson's Monticello. A natural starting point for trips to western Virginia, the center highlights the roles of George Rogers Clark and other pioneer patriots in displays and a film.

The Northern Virginia Bicentennial Center in Alexandria was opened in 1974 in the beautifully restored Lyceum, a 19th century Greek Revival building. Exhibits and a film feature the leadership role of Virginia's landed gentry—Washington, Mason and the Lees—in America's struggle for independence.

beagle hound provided the first intimation that winter's days were numbered. She would start a snowshoe hare in a thicket and expect it to run its usual tight little circle. Instead, it might head straight out a half mile or more, and only then would it circle in rabbit fashion. This puzzled me as much as it did my dog until I realized the answer. It was rabbit spring. For the most part, the rabbit lives out its life within the bounds of a few acres. It is only in the early spring that the bucks wander afield seeking mates. Once started by a hound, a wanderer makes a bee-line for his homeplace and circles on familiar ground.

On those occasions when my dog went out of my hearing I would be forced to bushwhack across bog and thicket until I caught up with the chase. More often than not, it was night before I could get her in.

The deep woods would offer other signs of winter's weakening grasp. I'd hear the lively music of water flushing out the rills and brooks. Fat partridges would be perched in the alders stuffing themselves with plump buds. I would come upon myriads of snowfleas darkening a bank of rotting snow, some like the Isotoma feeding on diatoms and other miniature plants, others devouring other snowfleas.

Then, after the first warm southerlies, I would hear the resounding ping of ice settling on the back ponds, fair warning to smelt fishermen that it was time to take their shacks ashore and begin thinking about tying a few flies for the trout season ahead.

Spring means different things to different people. For some, it's the first robin, sap buckets hanging from rock maples or the opening chorus of peepers in the bogs. There is no predictable order or rhythm to the coming of spring in Northern New England: it can be one step forward and two back, a series of soft days and then a sudden backlash of winter in the form of a wild northeast snowstorm. The downright contrariness of a Maine spring lends spice and adventure to its unfolding.

The second day after my arrival home last spring I set out with my Brittany on a reconnaissance survey. It was March 28. The wind was raw, the sunlight thin and unnourishing as breadline soup: gray snow lay in pockets on the northern slopes of the rolling fields. My dog checked out her familiar woodchuck holes and found no scent of life. Then, as she swung back she put up a killdeer. Off it flew in jagged flight, sounding its alarm cry as it went. Further along, I stopped to listen to the sweet wistful song of a phoebe. As I walked along the edge of the ocean I heard the raucous clamor of spring crows. I seem to think I can distinguish transient crows from the winter residents. The earliest of returning migrants, they are noisier than their stay-at-home brothers. It's as if they wish to compensate for their pusillanimity in opting to escape from Maine's winter rigors.

As my steps turned homeward, I heard what must be the most stirring of spring's harbingers. The sound of that wild plangent honking came first to my ears, and I turned to see a ragged formation of Canada geese all but scraping the frieze of naked trees. As I watched, the flock veered east and the pitch of the chorus lowered to a deep chuckling, the voice of geese sighting a feeding ground and preparing to set down. The leader had sighted the Lily Pond, a waterfowl sanctuary and a favorite goose feeding and resting ground. He had seen what I ascertained later that day; the margins of the pond were clear of ice.

So the curtain was rising, for all the bleak aspect of the landscape. The next day at sundown I heard another spring omen. The soft hooting of that mourning dove was brief and little more than a five-fingered exercise, but that biblical "voice of the turtle" was doubly a delight for this sound of spring is relatively new to our region. A dozen years ago, it was rare to see one of these slender, soft-spoken birds in our fields. Today, they are common, and each year a few stay at home to enjoy the winter.

Nothing much happened in the early days of April. Winter birds, blue jays, evening grosbeaks, purple finches, had our feeders to themselves. A few robins arrived, but found nothing to sing about. Then on April 4 we were hit by the worst snowstorm of the year. A lashing northeaster, accompanied by winds of hurricane force, dropped 10 inches of snow upon the earth. An emergent spring was stopped in its tracks.

In Maine, a snow that comes in April is called a "robin snow." It is said to draw the last frost from the earth and bring the earthworms to the surface; but clearly the small contingent of bedraggled robins that sat huddled in our lilacs did not regard the deep white blanket as a blessing. It snowed on and off for three days. Once again, winter possessed the land. But the victory was more apparent than real. A high sun and a day of warm rain made short work of the snow blanket; spring reformed its ranks and continued its forward march, however slowly.

I did spy a woodchuck sitting on its haunches and eyeing my bare garden. And I noted that woodcock had begun to move in from their wintering grounds in the Deep South. I surmised that these shy oddfellows of the damp alder runs were finding some difficulty in drilling for worms in the half-frozen earth. For a day or two after the snowstorm one of them cautiously approached my bird feeder seeking an earthworm substitute. It eased in with that curious woodcock shuffle, two steps forward and one step backward that struck me as most appropriate to the indecisive season.

I was encouraged on April 10 to hear the sweet fluting of a white-throated sparrow. Putatively, this spring song exhorts Farmer Peabody to sow wheat, though quite obviously it was too early to sow anything less hardy than peas. The robin song I heard the next morning was welcome enough but hardly convincing. It attempted no more than a few tentative bars before subsiding into an embarrassed silence.

Just when it appeared that spring was stuck in the mud somewhere south of Boston, three fine warm days in a row blessed the land like a benediction. The ice on the ponds grew porous and darkened to the color of gunmetal. Ice-out occurs without fanfare: one day the pond is locked in ice, the next day open water reflects the sky. Quietly, magically, the back ponds shake free of their winter thrall.

The ice was out of the small back ponds by April 23. I knew then that there would be no turning back: Maine spring had at long last reached the point of no return. The confirmation came two days later when on a warm evening I heard the first peepers. This was no false prophecy. These tiny toads hibernate in the earth and the earth must warm to release them and send the males to the water edges to join in a swelling prenuptial chorus. I recalled my attempts as a small boy to try to locate the source of this piping and my frustration as I was met by a sudden silence as I approached. I seldom persisted in my search, fearing, I expect, that the interruption might somehow delay spring's coming.

I had been home a month almost to a day when the peepers announced the season of renewal. I had the feeling that having attended its sluggard approach I had earned spring's fulfillment. Now May was here and in a few brief days the rewards would be shadbush flowering along backcountry roads, fiddleheads pushing up along swollen woodland brooks and mayflowers blooming in the glades.

It was time, I told myself, to enjoy my ultimate reward; I would journey forth to witness what for me were the official rites of spring. The sun was setting as I drove down a back country road. I chose a likely spot at the edge of an old gravel pit. The dove colors of evening marked the western sky as I settled down to wait for the show to begin.

I had come to see the woodcock on his singing ground. The courtship display began in the dusk with the faint preflight peents. The sound grew louder, coming from this way and that as the male addressed the female hiding shyly in the thick growth. Then my woodcock sprang from the earth and rose in tightening circles into the sky. Its flight feathers whistling, it poured out its heart in exultant song as it towered. Two hundred feet in the sky, it turned, banked and, wings folded, plunged downward like a duck hawk. When it appeared that this feathered missile would dash itself to pulp upon the earth, wings braked the dive, and it settled lightly as a falling leaf to its landing pad.

Again and again, my woodcock rose. It was dark when the show was over. I drove home satisfied that all was right with the world. Yes, spring had been late; but then, Maine spring is forever late. Like the long distance runner, Maine spring saves its kick for the final lap.

th?" He raised eyebrows, "Well, now some parts enough. Parts, mind. All lly."

CORMICK trained for her ion by biking in Central

The train then continued to Chester, about 100 miles northwest of London, and when it finally neared our destination in Wales we saw that the land was touched with wildness, the shadows grayed in more deeply. Then, over the bridge across the Menai Strait, which makes an island of Anglesey, it smoothed and softened, meadows rolling to the choppy waves of the chilly-looking, gray Irish Sea.

When the train drew up at the last stop, Holyhead, we were joined in the baggage car by the conductor. As he helped us to hand down the bikes, he gave my husband a lingering pat. "Used to do a bit of it myself—cycling," he said. "Haven't thought of it in years."

Just about 50 yards from the railway station loomed a freighter—the platform on the other side of the station turned magically into a dock. Against the milky sky, the station's pigeons swirled with the seafaring gulls.

"Well . . . ta-da," said the conductor; he sounded wistful. Then abruptly he turned away, saying, "Mind the dangers."

For two days we stayed in a resort village outside Holyhead in a rambling Victorian hotel, the Trearddur Bay. We had a 35-foot room with porcelain doorknobs, carpeted bathroom, stretch-out tub, and a picture window to the bay for $15 a day, including breakfast. The hotel fatally destroyed our expectations of Welsh accommodations. If subsequent rooms were more modest, at least the breakfasts remained out-sized, geared for people who filled the plump hayricks dotting the tan September fields.

We spent those two days acquainting ourselves with our new bicycles and their intimidatingly wide choice of gears. They did not have 10 consecutive speeds, as I'd expected. The right-hand gear produced 5—2 lows, 2 highs, and a medium; the left gear glided the chain onto a smaller sprocket, which tightened the revolutions on all speeds. Although theoretically doubling the five speeds, I could see an advantage to the smaller sprocket only at lowest gear, for uphill pumping. Nevertheless, in some mysterious (to me) fashion, in any combination of gears, the pedals spun with more ease than on my 3-speeder. And although Anglesey was fairly flat, what crimps it had I took without resorting to lowest gear.

Using the gears took practice. We also needed to get the feel of the bicycles themselves. They were taller than we were used to, giving a greater stretch to the legs—and greater distance to the ground when I put a foot down, causing a couple of tumbles that on a busy highway could have been fatal.

But the chief reason for lingering was the land itself. Half the size of Rhode Island, Anglesey is a myth of Wales for the Welsh; it was the last part of Wales to fall to the Romans, last to the English. It is old, marked by cromlechs (tiny Stonehenges) and, standing solitary in checkered fields, like abandoned pawns, huge oaks sacred to its ancient Druids. Anglesey grows grain, is called the nourisher of Wales, and yet is profoundly seabound: Cows graze in silhouette against light-shot waves, snowy gulls flake the brown furrows. It answers the heart's longing for placid fields, and yet restless, for the sea.

On the third morning, packed and ready to leave, I heard an automobile down below warming up—signal for take-off. But not for us. The only sound we heard, coasting down the road toward Four Mill Bridge, which would take us from the island to the mainland, was the sound of the morning. This was an intimacy: feeling travel as a soft flow of air around my body, my own body making the wheels turn and the miles roll out; smelling it, as hay in a far field; smoke from the pipe of an old man walking his dog; the powdery tar of a coal delivery. And the close-up—two ravens battling down a slate roof, the edging on parlor curtains, names of houses, even the titles of the magazines people read, waiting for a bus.

We had made reservations 25 miles away at a country inn outside Caernarvon. Would we run the course? How rough was the road? It had been described by people at the hotel as "not too bad, on the whole." But if there's one thing a bicycle does better than a car it's to communicate topography, with a special flair for relief. The hotel guests didn't know what the road was like; they'd never biked it.

We had to get off and push many times. By 6 P.M., after walking the bikes up a winding forest road in the darkening evening and reaching the inn, it occurred to me we were really on a bike with a two-wheeled conveyance for our luggage.

The gray-stone building was the Plas y Bryn, in Bontnewydd, two miles outside Caernarvon, a mom and pop inn—husband and wife running an old country mansion for paying guests at $13 a night for two, with breakfast, and a toilet down the hall.

The other guests were sedate North Englanders. When they learned we owned those bicycles rolled for safekeeping into a shed in back, where the beer was stored, they were astonished: We were cycling? Living out of knapsacks? We didn't, they hinted, look that sort. Our 15 pounds each of dunnage included one change for dinner, mine a navy knit suit and string of fake pearls, my husband's a tweed jacket, dark pants, knit tie. Their astonishment had familiar grounds: appearances deceive.

Clothes for the trip we'd closely thought out. Each of us carried two of whatever would need frequent washing, on the theory that in this climate they'd likely not dry overnight (if wrapped first in towelling they did, otherwise not), a cotton flannel shirt and, for the chill, a windbreaker, sweater and pair of gloves. (Mine were of string and a mistake; they caught in the gear-change lever and I had to buy a leather pair.) For the rain, ponchos. Change of shoes. My husband was wearing heavy work pants; I remembered, however, the way, even in New York, the saddle tongue sometimes rubbed a sensitive spot on my inner thigh, and set out to buy a soft cotton-jersey warm-up suit. But none of the New York stores sold them in cotton, only in synthetics that "kept their shape"—as does medieval armor. A sympathetic salesman at Abercrombie's slipped me the name Paragon, where I bought one in bunny-soft cotton for half the cost of the mail version uptown.

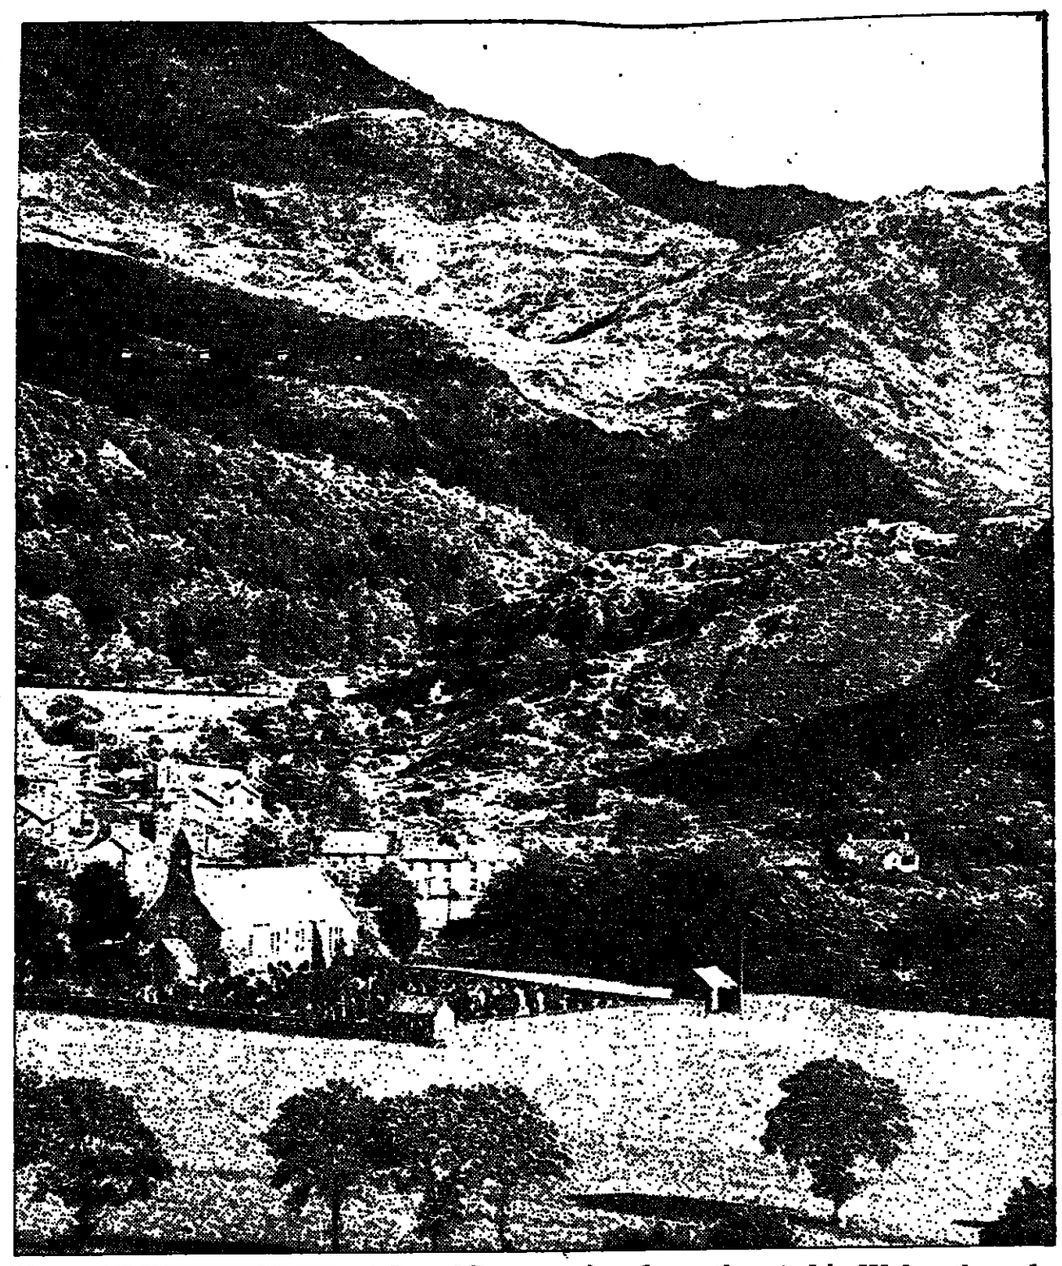
The other potential sore spot we protected by slipping foam rubber carwashing mitts beneath our saddle covers.

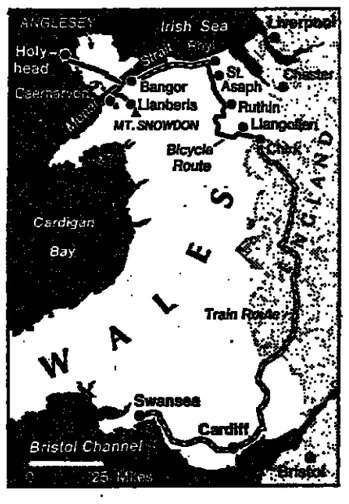
While there had been some easy stretches, the first day on the road had been discouraging. We were in the hilliest part of Wales, the northwest corner. We'd come to see Mount Snowdon (3,560 feet), the highest mountain in Wales.

The next morning, heading for Llanberis, where a special train runs to the peak, we were pushing doggedly when we drew abreast a man walking down. In a friendly Irish brogue, he said simply, "Turn back."

So we did. What had set us on this track, anyway? Automobile mentality: See it all. But we were freed of all that. For us there were no musts.

Swinging around, we had a nice coast downhill, and headed for the north coast, pedaling along the fairly level





"On a bike, coasting down the road in Wales, the only sound we heard was the sound of the morning. This was an intimacy: feeling travel as a soft flow of air around my body, my own body making the wheels turn and the miles roll out; smelling the hay in a far field."

east side of the Menai Strait to Bangor. We had made no reservations, but had our pick of rooms at the two hotels we tried, the British and the Castle, which won out by offering for our bikes the beer-storage room. It was an early 17th-century farmhouse, nicely restored, but nevertheless we found the modest-size room at $18 hard to warm up to after the huge one at Trearddur Bay.

Bangor, like Caernarvon, is a bustling town (population 15,000, big for Wales) with a pleasantly country look: A town clock, brick and stone walk-up buildings; in store windows, rubber boots for fishing, canvas gloves for tractoring, people on main street with cheeks brightened by the outdoors bending over each others' children, and dogs. Near the University was a newly-built theater in which, the second night, we saw a vigorous celebration of Welshhood called "Harping Around" (which alternated with Dylan Thomas's "Under Milkwood").

We hadn't planned to spend the second night, but I had broken my bike. In London, we'd asked to have installed, along with mudguards and clamp racks, prop stands. The salesman had advised against prop stands. Better to use a wall for support; on a prop stand there was danger the bikes would fall over. Mine did, loaded with luggage, and bent the rear wheel.

In his crowded shop full of broken bikes, the repairman we found didn't look like a repairman but, dressed in tweeds and striped tie, like a clubman. Perhaps because men's fashions here remain steadfast, enabling a man to build up a wardrobe like a bank account, even garage attendants and deliverymen look like whisky ads. He offered to put aside his other work and repair the wheel by the next morning. Charge: $6.

The rough sketch for the following days was to turn off the coast farther east into the Vale of Clwyd, with its historical old villages and farming country, and to get within easy distance of it we took the 40-minute ride by train to Rhyl.

The town was souped up for the tourist trade—the only one we were to see thus afflicted—and we stayed only long enough to pick up bread and cheese to eat along the road to Saint Asaph. Poconos. The near country.

Now we're even nearer. Rt. 80 is open all the way from the George Washington Bridge to the Delaware Water Gap.

Only an hour and a half to what looks like Switzerland. But look what the Swiss are missing. We've got the Pennsylvania Dutch, Indian lakes and waterfalls. Summer stock, auto races and trout-stocked streams. Grand golf and great bikini scenery. Wild game farms and wilder nightlife.

It's every sport under the summer sun. And some that aren't. (Even ice skating!) It's mountains of fun. Next to home but no place like it.

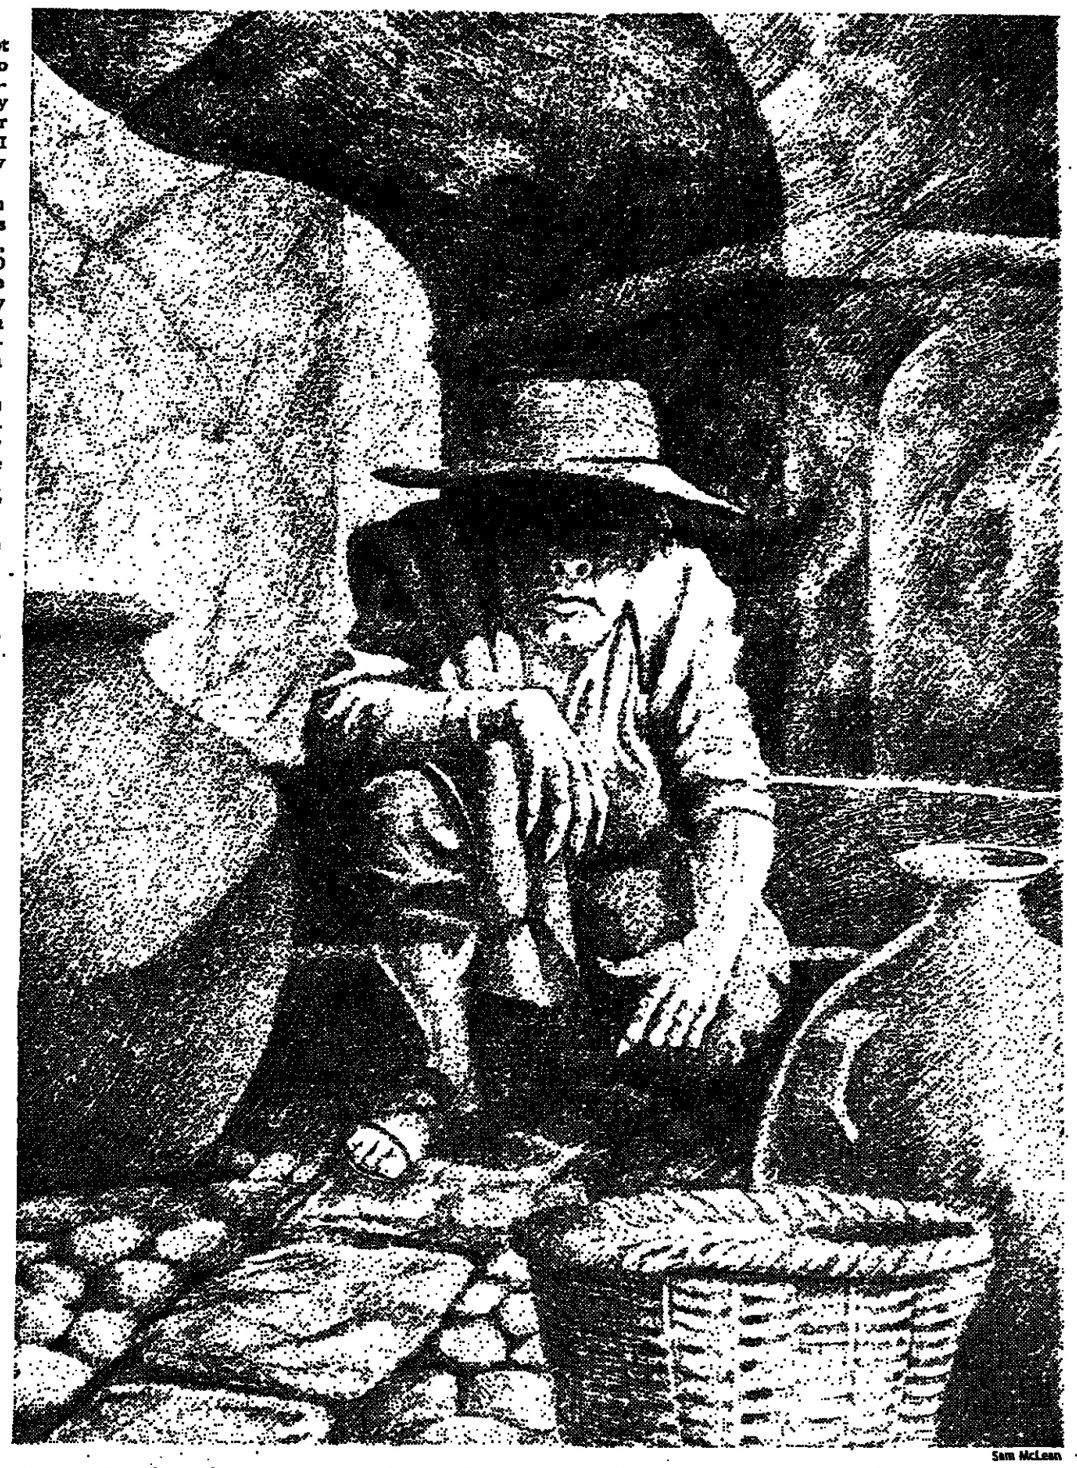
RD O'MARA, who is on the staff Baltimore Sun, recently returned working for two years in the Latin American bureau.



Sam McLean

He waits for the very occasional foreigner. The Indians are not impressed.

Like Quasimodo, the human gargoyle of Notre Dame, he approaches on thin, bowed legs, his head down, his face covered by a smashed felt hat. His hands come out like claws. There are sores running up his arms. He seems the carrier of diseases from a primitive past. He has impact, as much as any beggar anywhere.

Which is saying something, for South America is full of beggars. The ugliest are found in Brazil, men with half bodies who lurch along on their knuckles, legions of the deformed and maimed who prowl the streets of Rio de Janeiro and the cities of northern Brazil like gaunt ghosts. The most pathetic beggars of South America, in that they evoke such deep sadness, are in Colombia. They are the child beggars.

On that Sunday I arrived in Santa Rosa, got off the bus in the plaza and was immediately accosted. My reaction was pure revulsion. I gave up the coin in haste, then headed out to see the convent. I returned within an hour, disappointed, and took possession of one of the benches in the plaza to await the bus. Again the dwarf saw his opportunity and approached. Again I produced the coin.

But then, for some reason—possibly I was tired, or felt I had been had one time too often—I pulled it back. The dwarf drew closer, shook his arm like a threatening leper. I pulled the coin farther back toward my body.

"Not until we have a look at you," I said, my voice a bit unsteady. The dwarf raised his head. "What's this!" I blurted, then began to laugh. "You're not so terrible."

The beggar's features were small, in perfect proportion to his body. His eyes were large, brown, like cow's eyes. He smiled under the gray hat. It was a pleasant smile; he had most of his teeth. Then the dwarf came closer, laughed himself, a small laugh, and embraced me. We stood there for what seemed a long time. Mutt and Jeff meeting after a long separation. There was no fear between us.

Then the bus plunged into the plaza, blowing its tinny horn. The Indian women piled off, a flurry of red, wrinkled skin and white hats, chattering as they always do, half Spanish, half Quechua, their ancient mother tongue. There were no foreigners this time; the dwarf wandered back and crouched again under the fountain. I climbed aboard. Then the bus lurched out of the plaza and headed down the dirt road. Santa Rosa and its monster were quickly lost in the dust.

What's Doing in PARIS

By HERBERT R. LOTTMAN

OUTDOOR LIFE—Paris remains a moveable feast, in Hemingway's phrase, and the best way to enjoy it is to move around a lot. Walking is recommended; from a centrally located hotel you'll be able to make forays in all directions. First-time visitors needn't be ashamed to take a half-day tour of major sites for general orientation before going off on their own. For a quick, all-encompassing look, try the $9 Cityrama tour or choose a tour of either historical Paris ($6.50), modern Paris (same price) or Left Bank sites with a motorboat cruise along the Seine ($12.50). Departures are from 3 Boulevard des Capucines and other points; ask a travel agent or hotel porter. The newest feature of old Paris is that the (blighted) elm trees of the Place des Vosges have been removed. Controversy rages as to whether to replace them in the name of nature or keep the square without trees, as it was when Henri IV designed it as a formal promenade and tournament ground. For the moment, visitors can take advantage of the void to admire this extraordinary ensemble of townhouses as no one has been able to see them for generations. (Automobiles parked around the square look more out of place now than ever.)

GETTING AROUND—The newest hurdle for travelers is Charles de Gaulle Airport in Roissy, now used for trans-Atlantic flights. (Many European connections still operate out of Orly and Le Bourget.) Even seasoned travelers get lost in the circular terminal, and the trip between Roissy and Paris by taxi costs $12 to $15 (not counting tip and luggage charges). The trip takes at least 30 minutes. If you are traveling light, you can use the No. 350 bus, which runs between Roissy and the Porte de la Chappelle Métro (subway) station, the Gare (train station) du Nord and the Gare de l'Est. The fare is approximately $1.75. For the return trip to Roissy, you can use five transit tickets in place of the cash fare. They can be purchased at Métro stations in books (carnets) of 10 tickets for $2 second class, $3 first class. For travel around town, tourist authorities suggest using a Billet de Tourisme good for four or seven days of unlimited travel on public transportation (first class on the Métro) at $6.90 and $11, respectively. I have a counter-suggestion: For $9 you can have a full calendar month of unlimited travel with the new second-class Carte Orange, obtainable at Métro stations; just be sure to bring a small identity photograph with you. You can't travel first class on the Métro with it, nor can you go as far outside Paris as Versailles (the Billet de Tourisme lets you do that), but for all other purposes it is more convenient to use. (A first-class Carte Orange is also available at twice the price of the second-class pass.) They are available at any Métro station; Billets du Tourisme can be purchased upon presentation of your passport at certain Métro stations, at railroad stations, at Transport Board (RATP) offices and at banks. It is also available from the office of the French National Railways at 610 Fifth Avenue in New York. For short stays use the 10-ticket carnets, which are good on Métro as well as buses. And why not ride the buses more and subways less? Surface transportation serves every key point in Paris; the buses are clean and relatively comfortable outside rush hours; routes are clearly marked at bus stops, many of which contain complete system maps. Even if you are held up in traffic you see more from a bus.

ON FOOTING—Paris is laid out on horizontal lines, most of them running east-west. From the courtyard of the Louvre palace and museum, it is still an exciting walk through the small Arch of Triumph at Place du Carrousel (the garden is now an outdoor museum of Maillol bronzes, the best free art show in Paris). The stroll continues through the Tuileries gardens with their see-saw rides, Pronstian merry-go-round and afternoon marionette shows (peek in to watch the kids watching the show). The walk used to go on across Place de la Concorde, but motor traffic now makes crossing the square extremely dangerous. Take the long way around, crossing at the lights to Rue de Rivoli, then follow the building lines around, past the American Embassy and then to the elegantly trimmed gardens of the Champs-Elysées. You can pick up city bus No. 73 anywhere along here if you are unable to pursue the trip on foot up the Champs-Elysées to the Arc de Triomphe at Place de l'Etoile (now called Place Général de Gaulle). Either on foot or by bus you are making your way through a most spectacular urban landscape. A similarly rewarding walk, this time west-to east, starts at Place de la Concorde and follows the Left Bank quays. The architecture ranges from the medieval up to the later 19th century, encompassing the charming townhouses and palaces along Quai Voltaire, Quai Malaquais, Quai Conti and Quai Grands Augustins, the gracious Institut de France palace housing the Académie Française and the prospect of Ile de la Cité with its tip pointing into the Seine like a ship's prow. The spire you see in the center of the island belongs to Saint Chapelle, with its fragile-seeming stone lacework; you also see the towers and the spire of Notre Dame Cathedral. If you have the strength, continue along the riverbank to Ile St. Louis, the small island that clings to Ile de la Cité like a lifeboat to the mother ship. Most of Ile St. Louis was constructed in the early 17th century and has kept its architectural harmony. Bus No. 24 covers the same route but from east to west: from Ile St. Louis to Place de la Concorde.

HERBERT R. LOTTMAN, an American writer living in Paris, is the author of the forthcoming "How Cities Are Saved."

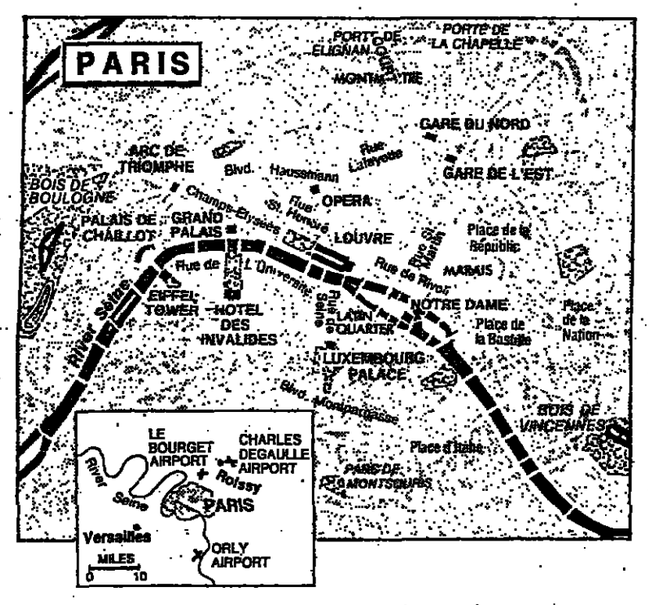
SIDE TRIPS—You don't need an automobile to make forays into the countryside. Convenient trains take you to Versailles, Fontainebleau, Chartres, Chantilly and other favorite out-of-Paris sites. You can even travel by train to the Loire Valley chateaux. Take the train to Tours and book bus tours of the famous Renaissance castles. Driving and especially parking in the center of Paris is increasingly difficult and may spoil your day or your week. Better to use public transportation.

ACCOMMODATIONS—Paris has a number of hotels that would normally remain empty because of their absence of charm and their remote location. Yet each year these hotels are filled to their attics with unhappy Americans, victims of unaware or uncaring travel agents who book them because it's easy to find a room in such places. (Would you stay in the Bronx on a sightseeing trip to New York City?) The happy truth is that there is an abundance of relatively inexpensive hotels at least as comfortable in the heart of Paris, within short walks of the Seine at its prettiest point, Notre Dame, the Latin Quarter and the great museums. Two hotels near St. Germain des Prés illustrate the point: the Hotel du Danube at 58 Rue Jacob, a block south of the Seine, which offers doubles without bath at $13.75 or with bath from $20 to $26, breakfast and service charge included, and the Hotel de l'Université, a few hundred feet to the west at 22 Rue de l'Université, an old townhouse renovated with taste, where charming if small doubles with bath run $35 to $50 (the latter on the top floor, with terrace). A favorite hotel with seasoned travelers is the St. Simon at 14 Rue St. Simon on a quiet street in the Faubourg St. Germain district dear to Proust. Doubles with bath or shower run $20 there. Similar convenience can be found across the river. Two inexpensive and, therefore, quite plain establishments are the Hotel de l'Oratoire, just behind the Louvre at 141 Rue St. Honoré (double with bath, $24) and the Prince Albert, 5 Rue St. Hyacinth within minutes of the Tuileries gardens and the Place Vendôme (doubles with bath $25).

LATE FLASH—On a charming Renaissance street bordering the Latin Quarter, an old convent was recently transformed into what should be the Left Bank's most luxurious hostelry: the Relais Bisson, 3 Rue Christine. (The Bisson was formerly on the nearby quay.) This is an expensive hotel, but for those who can afford a night or two of Parisian elegance it gives full value. Average doubles are $50. There are several duplex suites starting at $65. Duplex No. 24, for example, at $79, faces an inner courtyard and contains a bedroom, drawing room, small salon and office with sloped ceilings and visible beams. Another new hotel is the 1,000-room, 32-story Paris-Sheraton at 19 Rue du Commandant Mouchotte. Each room has color TV, and dial-a-movie service is available (doubles about $44 to $60, plus 7 percent service charge). The studios, clubs and cafés of Montparnasse are only minutes away on foot, as are some of Paris's quaintest thoroughfares such as Rue de l'Ouest. One advantage is that Sheraton rooms can be reserved from any part of the United States with a toll-free call to 800-325-3535.

ONION SOUP AND FRITES—Little remains of Paris's famous central markets (les Halles) except a big hole; the area is undergoing radical renovation. But the old restaurants are still there. A favorite haunt, Pied-du Cochon at 6 Rue Coquillière, still serves onion soup —$1.60 if you order it at the ground-floor counter where the plat du jour is available at $1.80 (it may be steak with shallots or a cassoulet). Neighborhood people are likely to be found here and not in the more expensive restaurant section of the establishment. Across the river and side by side on Boulevard Montparnasse are two local institutions, Rougeot (at No. 59) and Roger la Frite (No. 57); don't mix them up. The former is an authentic Gay Nineties eatery all in mirrors, where even an average meal is enhanced by the décor. The fixed-price meal is $4, drinks and tip not included; à la carte main dishes run from $2.50 to about $4. Closed Mondays (for reservations phone LIT—9866). As for Roger la Frite (frites are French fries), it's essentially a sit-down Nedick's, where a couple of French-style hot dogs served on a plate with frites costs just under $1, roast chicken and frites $1.50, a somewhat ordinary steak with frites $1.60 (plus 12 percent service charge). A glass of red table wine is 18 cents. There is a sidewalk window for stand-up service. After you have exhausted the possibilities of the foregoing, thumb through the current Guide Michelin—no French is necessary to use it—and try a one-, two- or three-star restaurant in a neighborhood convenient to you. Starred restaurants are expensive, but it would be a pity to leave Paris without trying at least one of them.

LA COUPOLE—To see indoor Paris at its liveliest, which is its best, drop in at La Coupole, the noted café-restaurant of the 1920's that is still a favorite haunt of Parisian artists and writers and, now, TV and movie people as well. The pillars running down the middle of the vast room were decorated by painters in fashion between the two World Wars. The size of the room—350 to 400 diners can be seated comfortably—contributes to an atmosphere that is at once relaxed and with-it. Jean-Paul Sartre wrote some of his major works there, and although he claimed in a widely reprinted interview last year that he doesn't go to La Coupole any more, he was observed on a recent afternoon lunching in the rear right corner (with Simone de Beauvoir, of course). It's just the kind of place where a famous face can feed in peace despite the crowd; you are not supposed to notice. Come here for a relatively quiet breakfast, a convenient lunch or a noisy late supper or snack. Or an afternoon cup of coffee (demi tasse 50 cents plus 15 percent service charge). The left side of the room, with paper tablecloths, is the brasserie; the smaller right-hand section, with real tablecloths, has a higher-priced menu with essentially the same food. In the brasserie the encyclopedic menu includes onion soup gratinée at $1.60, duck with French peas at $4.50, a poire Belle Helène (pear with vanilla ice cream, covered with hot chocolate sauce) at $1.80. A bottle of Côtes du Rhône red wine costs $4. Add 15 percent service charge. The address is 102 Boulevard Montparnasse; tel: 326-9590. If you haven't reserved during peak dinner hours—from 8:30 to about 10:30 P.M.—merely give your name to the maître d'hôtel on arrival and wait in the bar area on the left side of the restaurant; no pre-dinner drink is required.



DAY AND NIGHT—Living it up in Paris follows a traditional pattern. The race tracks just outside the city center, such as Longchamp, Auteuil and St. Cloud, draw lively and colorful crowds. Longchamp is a particularly elegant track in the Bois de Boulogne at the western edge of Paris. Races are being held there this year from April through June and in September and October. Entrance: $1.90 ($2.25 on certain days such as June 27—Grand Prix de Paris—and Oct. 3—Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe). Minimum bet: $2.25. All Paris tracks are closed in August. You can continue the high life through the evening with the dinner show at the Lido cabaret on the Champs-Elysées, which has drawn generations of tourists with its tall Bluebell Girls, its trapezes and horses and even camels on stage, its skating rink (sometimes it's a swimming pool filled with Bluebell Girls). Dinner-dancing begins at 8:30, with shows at 10:45 and 12:45. Dinner (including the show) costs $27. High, but you'll probably spend more at a lesser-known establishment because you will be clipped. The Crazy Horse Saloon, at 12 Avenue George V, offers no-nonsense striptease, but with humor and—one dares say—art. The 120-minute shows at 9:45 P.M. and 12:15 A.M. can be covered uncomfortably from the bar (entrance fee and one drink, $15) or from a handkerchief-size table where you'll be seated mighty close to your neighbors, if not on their laps (entrance fee plus drink, $27).

EVENTS—The major art show of the year will be held at the Grand Palais from May 22 to July 19 after having been seen in Rotterdam, Brussels and Baden-Baden. It covers the precursors and heroic years of surrealism from 1860 to 1910 (daily except Tuesday from 10 A.M. to 8 P.M., Wednesday till 10 P.M.; admission $1.80). An unusual exhibition at the Louvre will illustrate painting techniques from the 16th century to the present. It will show the various steps in planning a picture, preparing the canvas or wood base, applying the paints and varnishes, with examples taken from the museum's collection (Techniques de la Peinture, June 5 to Nov. 15, daily except Tuesday from 9:45 A.M. to 5 P.M.; the $1.10 admission to the Louvre includes entrance to this show; free on Sundays). Paris will have a music festival from April 15 to 29 (see corner kiosks or a local periodical for events during the days you're in town). On Sundays April 11, May 9 and May 16, chamber music concerts will be held in the Opera at 6:30 P.M., affording a rare chance to hear music in this prestigious theater for a mere $2.20. But at any time of year one or another of the city's Romanesque, Gothic or Renaissance churches (such as St. Germain de Pres or St. Severin on the Left Bank) will be holding a concert series of ancient or contemporary music, announced—on short notice—on posters. From early June to July 14 the Marais Festival features theater classics, ballet and concerts in the courtyards of old palatial manors in the once-forgotten, now rehabilitated 4th arrondissement of Paris; get a program when you arrive in town.

PERENNIALS—During renovation of the Comédie Française which will be going on all year, performances have been shifted to the Marigny Theater on Rue Marigny just off the Champs-Elysées (tel. 742-2731). An unusual Paris institution, the Cinématheque, is a museum of the movies, with four different film classics a day shown in their original versions in the Palais de Chaillot on the Place du Trocadero (admission: $1.10). Schedules appear in daily newspapers and weekly entertainment guides (or phone 325-4164).

ART FOR SALE—An excellent Left Bank private gallery is Karl Flinker, specialist in contemporary art, at 25 Rue de Tournon (just below the Luxembourg Palace, whose gardens are the city's loveliest public park). The Rue de Seine, northern extension of Rue de Tournon and adjacent streets Rue Bonaparte and Rue des Beaux-Arts are dotted with small galleries worth exploring. On Rue des Beaux-Arts, look into the Franco Maria Ricci boutique-gallery for exquisitely designed limited editions of illustrated books. For an inexpensive gift for yourself or family and friends, visit the Chalcographie du Louvre, upstairs in the Louvre (stairway on the Seine side of the ground-floor box office), where engravings run off from original plates of the royal collections can be purchased at prices you will never see in a commercial gallery (open daily except Tuesday and Sunday from 9:45 A.M. to 5:15 P.M.; tel: 231-5940). The flea market beyond the Porte de Clignancourt still thrives on Saturdays, Sundays and Mondays from dawn to dusk. (Marché Paul-Bert at Rue Paul-Bert 8 is a good bet in the flea market for antiques.)

MUSEUMS—The Louvre is continually changing for the better, and new rooms are being opened. Hours are 9:45 A.M. to 5:15 P.M. daily except Tuesday; admission 70 cents, free on Sunday. The Marmottan Museum, once an unspectacular collection of objets d'art housed in the mansion of a wealthy collector near the Bois du Boulogne (2 Rue Louis Boilly), now contains the world's best collection of Monet paintings—an unexpected legacy—housed in new galleries under the pleasant rear garden (open from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. daily except Monday, $1.10 entry fee). This is the final year for the National Modern Art Museum (on Avenue du President Wilson) before the bulk of its holdings go to the Centre Beaubourg next year. The National Modern Art Museum is open from 9:15 A.M. to 5:15 P.M. daily except Tuesday; $1.10 entry fee, free Sunday. A number of lesser-known museums have had a face-lifting, such as the Musée des Techniques in the Conservatoire National des Arts et Métiers, 292 Rue St. Martin, where antique aircraft are suspended from the ceiling of an old church while early model motorcars line the nave and choir; there are many push-button exhibits that will appeal to children. (Open afternoons except Monday from 1:30 to 5:30 P.M., Sundays from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. Admission: 45 cents, free on Sunday.) Two museums side by side on Place du Trocadéro can be visited in tandem: Musée de la Marine (daily except Tuesday from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M., admission: $1.10) for its magnificent collection of scale models of ancient and modern sailing ships, including some that were built by the French royal navy for training purposes, and the Musée de l'Homme (from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. daily except Tuesday, also $1.10), an ethnological museum strong on the arts and crafts of former French overseas possessions. My favorite small museum, the Musée des Plans et Reliefs (scale models of French frontier and coastal cities and forts constructed for defense planning under Lous XIV and subsequent kings), is now part of the Musée de l'Armée in the Hôtel des Invalides complex; the $1.10 entrance ticket to the Musée de l'Armée is valid for admittance to the Plans et Reliefs museum, but the hours differ. Musée de l'Armée is open from 10 A.M. to 12:15 P.M. and from 1:30 to 6 P.M. (5 P.M. on Monday, Wednesday and Friday until March 31); Plans et Reliefs is open from 10 A.M. to 12:30 P.M. and from 2 P.M. to 4:30 P.M. Both museums are closed Sunday morning and all day Tuesday.

CAVEAT EMPTOR—Watch your bills at restaurants and especially cafés, for even if notices proclaim that service is not included; overeager waiters often add the tip to the amount they demand from you orally or by chit, and if they forget to mention what they've done you will tip them a second time. But the famous Paris cafés like Deux-Magots and the Flore at St. Germain des Prés are already so expensive that you may walk out of them feeling you've just tipped everyone in Paris including the Prime Minister. Taxis are also expensive and—despite the inevitable letter to the editor telling how an honest driver returned somebody's traveler's checks or jewels or fur coat carelessly left on the back seat—the cabbies have half a dozen clever ways to cheat you. The only way to avoid being taken for a ride in Paris is to avoid riding in a taxi. Finally, change money in a bona fide bank, where you will always benefit from the day's dollar-franc exchange rate.

Connecticut Bicentennial Quiz

1. Who was America's most famous Revolutionary War spy? Nathan Hale. After joining the army, young Captain Hale volunteered for a vital spy mission at Washington's request. Betrayed by his Tory cousin and sentenced to hang, Hale immortalized the words, "I regret that I have but one life to lose for my country". The Hale Homestead in Coventry and one-room schoolhouses in New London and East Haddam where Hale taught are National Historic Landmarks. All are open seasonally.

2. Do you know where thousands of American troops survived a bitter Revolutionary War winter? If your answer is Valley Forge, Pa., you're only half correct. A similar courageous stand took place at Redding, Conn., where American troops, lacking food and adequate shelter, endured a bitter winter in their quest for freedom. Putnam Memorial State Park, known today as "Little Valley Forge", retains remnants of fireplaces, a powder magazine, and living quarters as evidence of their heroism. The museum, open in summer, contains Revolutionary War artifacts. The park itself is an important year-round stop on your Connecticut Bicentennial tour.

3. How can I get complete information on these and other exciting places in Connecticut? Just mail this coupon today.

The Surprising Life of Eastern Europe

Chances are your friends haven't been there and it is hardly an area of the world your neighbors might think to visit. Yet, now that much of Eastern Europe has become receptive to American tourism, you should go—because what you'll see is likely to surprise and please you.

The best way to maximize your enjoyment while keeping your concerns to a minimum is to have a travel agent book you on an efficient, well-organized, don't-miss-anything-important package tour, such as the Finnair 15-day "Best of Eastern Europe."

You'll be on a comprehensive visit to many of the world'd most fascinating cities, ones that many (if not most) Americans have never seen. And, because the most remarkable changes have taken place in these countries over recent years, you will have a vacation that will be a conversation source for years to come.

The wonderful storybook quality of Prague seems to go on forever, regardless of changing times. Here's a part of the Mala Strana (Little Town) as seen across the Moldau.

Beyond the Brandenburg Gate

To give you an idea of what this tour is all about, let me take you on a kind of surface skim across some of the main features.

Your first stop is in East Berlin, where what you may have read in the past about this half of a divided city just doesn't jibe with what your eyes will see. All around you are sleek, modern buildings, broad avenues, and the vitality of a metropolis on the move. Remember, after all, that East Berlin is the capital of a nation of 17 million people; it's now the world's tenth-ranked industrial power. (That fact may be another surprise to Western visitors.)

Prague—wonderful city of art, music, theater and literature—is next. There's an unforgettable view of the left bank of the Vltava (Moldau), where the cupolas and spires of churches, crowned by the majestic Prague Castle, emerge from the sea of roofs of palaces and burghers' houses. Cobbled streets, lovely bridges, delightful cafes. . . . No wonder tourists fall in love with Prague. From there, you board the fabled Orient Express to Budapest. It's really two cities— "Buda" and "Pest"—flanking the Danube.

The city reveals its splendor in its Heroes' Square, Town Park, Buda Castle and Matthias Cathedral. Dozens of charming cafes and fabulous Hungarian cuisine will tempt you back to Budapest some day.

You go from Budapest to Vienna by swift hydrofoil. There, in Waltzland, you'll tour St. Stephen's Cathedral. Historic buildings fill the handsome Ringstrasse in the Inner City. Concert houses, parks, fabulous restaurants offering famous Viennese pastries—you'll hate to leave. The next leg of the journey, alas, is home.

When you go on the "Best of Eastern Europe" tour, you get dinners every night, and evening theater performances in East Berlin, Prague and Budapest. Accommodations on the Orient Express are first-class. There's a half-day of sightseeing in each city, with local, English-speaking guides. Entrance fees to museums, exhibits, etc. are included where inside visits are scheduled. Complete schedules for all tours can be obtained from Finnair, 580 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y. 10036.

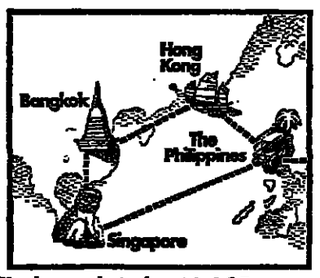
"I've been in the tour business for 40 years, and this is the best tour I've ever been on."

by Tommy Thomson
Professional Tour Director



"You know what a bargain is? Four countries in 16 days for about $1,200? That's a bargain!"

"Now listen! When I take off with a group of folks under my wing and manage to have a good time myself—well, that's a tour worth staking my name and reputation on, believe me.

What's it called? The Orient Enchantment Tour. Which couldn't be more descriptive!

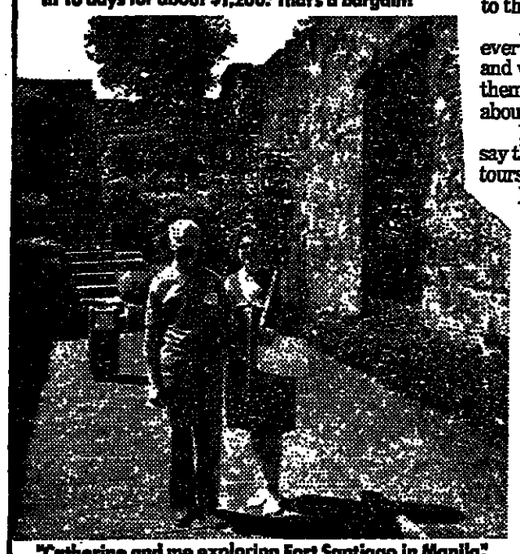
I'm telling you, those people over at Philippine Airlines really do things right. We got deluxe hotels, unusual excursions and fabulous meals that gave us more than a taste of Manila, Singapore, Bangkok and Hong Kong.

(We took the 16-day, but I might mention there is also a 21-day version of the tour, that adds Taipei and Japan to the itinerary.)

And here's something to remember. If there ever were any problems with reservations, schedules and what have you, Philippine Airlines kept it to themselves. (Unlike a lot of other tours I still dream about.)

Heck! I could talk your ear off. But let me just say that in all my 40 years of organizing and escorting tours, I haven't found a better one than this one.

I don't think you will either."



"Catherine and me exploring Fort Santiago in Manila."

"Don't wait 40 years like me. Fill this in."

"Why choose my ship,

Everyone who cruises looks for service. Our special Italian dining room staff is superb.

the m.s. Kungsholm, to the West Indies this Spring?"

Øivind Lorentzen, Jr. President, Flagship Cruises

You've shopped the travel ads. That's what you should do. Because then you'll realize one ship is a cut above the rest. The m.s. Kungsholm. And there are reasons why.

Why cruise with a corporation when you can cruise with a family?

The m.s. Kungsholm is owned and operated by members of one family. Øivind, Jr., Per, and Erling Lorentzen. They will personally see to it that your vacation is the very best.

All the pleasures of your world-wide cruises on our cruises to the West Indies.

Other ships can take you to the West Indies. Only one takes you there in style. The m.s. Kungsholm. Right now, she's on a 92-day cruise. On April 23, she leaves for six short cruises to the West Indies. Why shouldn't you live beautifully for nine days?

m.s. Kungsholm has more than just a touch of class.

You'll sense it instantly. The way she looks in port. The way she looks inside. The richness of the décor. Impressive is an understatement.

More to do on ship. And ashore.

Shape up for summer in our exercise program and sauna and pools. Dance to three bands, do the hustle at our disco parties. There's backgammon, and canasta, fashion shows, and much, much more. Golf and tennis lessons with a pro on ship, then play at a club ashore. Plus, on most cruises, organized fishing parties, beach parties, trips on glass-bottom boats. The Mores Of a Social Sub-Group

It is a breathtaking experience to watch a pickup camper pull into a site, to see the folding chairs set up, the folding table, the checkered oil cloth set out, the portable gas stove lit and hissing, the sleeping bags aired, the television antenna attached, the 90cc motorcycles gassed up, the yard lights strung, the water and electric service connected. And it is always rewarding to talk to the Arvee male after these exertions and ask him to speak of his love of the woods, the quiet and peace.

Enclosed trailers. Long, high metal houses on wheels, they are meant to be towed behind a car. They are usually the size of a one-bedroom apartment inside, sometimes larger. They give good protection against nature, and contain everything necessary to live in a manner that is close to the comfort of a tract home.

Self-propelled motor homes. A combination of a house and a school bus. Many are extravagantly luxurious. All are cumbersome—formidable adversaries on a narrow mountain road. These vehicles average about a quarter-mile per gallon of fuel.

Social Structure

The Arvee have evolved a rigid social structure based upon vehicle totemism. They live in loose-knit extended families, named according to their vehicles. There are the "Apaches," the "Nimrods," the "Trail-Kings," the "Dodges," the "Winnebagos" and the "Airstreams." It is unusual to see a "Winnebago" and an "Airstream" converse or share beans and franks, and I have found no evidence that they intermarry. However, much like an African eco-system, dependent families of unequal status do share facilities. It is not unusual when strolling through a campground at dusk to see Airstream and Trail-King Arvee filling their plastic jugs at the water tap, side by side, or standing in line outside the bathrooms.

The Winnebagos are the social and political leaders of the Arvee. Often I have witnessed the abject and childish awe of the lower orders when a Winnebago roars by. They will point and whisper, "There goes one!"

Winnebagos appear to have a well-defined sense of self-esteem. For example, they hang out small wrought iron signs near their doors that are rarely found elsewhere among Arvee. A typical one might read: "The Johnsons—Mac, Ethel, Jimmy, Sis and Bowser—Centerline, Kansas 73558."

Outwardly, the People are a loose-knit group, uninterested in collective action or political response. I do believe, however, that at night there are high-level strategy meetings in the Winnebagos.

I have no direct evidence. But I have noticed, time and time again, that if I made mention of moving from one park to another, when I arrived at the new site the next day many of the same units would already be there, even though I had left before them! I could not entice any Arvee to discuss this matter openly.

Religion

The Airstreams are the religious leaders of the Arvee. Their very name suggests something beyond the Earth, a sense of the ethereal. Many of the Airstreamers are older and more responsive to discussion about Arvee beliefs. It was from them that I learned the Arvee creation myth, so laden with symbolism. The Old Ones describe their beginnings as follows:

Once we lived in a house like yours. We paid the mortgage, skimmed the swimming pool, mowed the grass and resurfaced the driveway. Our children grew and left for the cities to become programmers. We sat on the porch in the evening. The dog was 13 when he passed away. Our only future was a retirement encampment in a swampy subdivision in a Southern state.

And then we attended the camper show at the local armory. It changed the lives of the People. We became Arvee. A voice directed us. We sold our property to developers. We bought an Airstream.

Now we live unattached to the ground, and able to pop in on the children any old time.

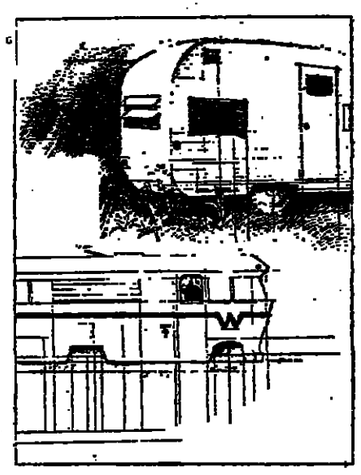
Family Life

Children. There are many youngsters in campgrounds. Adults cater to their children constantly and are generous and relaxed about it. They seem to truly enjoy the presence of their children. Indeed, many Arvee told me that they had assumed this way of life because of the children. Sometimes, to be provocative, I would point out that "for the sake of the children" was a phrase used to hold marriages together in the outside world. They would not discuss this, but would get a frightened look in their eyes and suddenly rush to the sanitation station to rinse their holding tanks.

Sex. One might conclude from the presence of so many children that the People have an active, open sex life. Nothing could be further from the truth. Traditional expressions of tenderness in public are rare. Male and female Arvee do not hold hands or hug. They do, however, sometimes slap each other to rid the mate of mosquitoes or gnats—perhaps a primitive form of sexual release.

In most campgrounds, individual vehicles are placed so close to each other that complete privacy is impossible—particularly on hot nights, with windows open. This openness was, to some degree, a boon for me, however, in my efforts to obtain accurate data on the mating habits of the Arvee. I crawled about in the darkness armed with a penlight and a clipboard. I listened at netted windows, peered in screen doors. After many nights I concluded that nothing whatever went on in those sleeping bags. Except sleep. Many times an Arvee would wake slightly if I made noise and say, "Go away, Bear!"

I could only conclude from this absence of mating that, like some gypsies, the Arvee abduct children. Although none of them complained of such treatment and no parents came to barter for the return of their children, many of the youngsters had the look of not belonging and would talk with fondness about being "home," going to the municipal swimming pool, stopping at "the pizzeria."



Homemaking

Arvee life is intimately bound up with the preparation, serving and eating of food. Much time is spent standing over their small green stoves.

Imagine an area the size of a football field, filled with 250 pickup trucks, trailers and motor homes. It is 7 A.M., and 250 Arvee females are frying bacon at dangerously high temperatures over their hissing fires. The smell of bacon is ubiquitous among the Arvee in their hair, clothing and equipment.

The People are also immensely fond of grilled meats. They place charcoal in metal pans, ignite it with a fluid, place a metal rack over the coals and sear the cheaper cuts of beef and pork over it. This activity is accompanied by great concern. Both males and females hover over the grills coqing at and bothering the meat. This is one of the very few activities that lead the Arvee to quarrel. The arguments—usually over how long the meat should be cooked on each side—can become so bitter that the family packs up and moves out.

Even harmonious meals are lively affairs among the Arvee, primarily because of the presence of foreign objects. Insects rank high on the list of objects in Arvee food. Ants, for example, attack anything with sugar, and the Arvee's inordinate fondness for very sweet iced tea almost assures their presenc quitoes are drawn to the grilled Common house flies seem addi the potato salad. Other foreign that appear regularly in Arvé are pine needles, fine sand, bro and the taste of liquids such and Coppertone.

I once found a toenail clij a bowl of GrapeNuts. This sor happens because meals are p inside crowded and jumbled

The Arvee ignite their Colem terns shortly after dark, thro large ring of greenish light the campsite. Then, like our Near forebears, they gather close their aluminum folding chairs t per nighttime fears of bears, r blowouts.

Fun & Games

The People seem generally and reserved by outer-world sta I heard very little real laug the campgrounds, but a reserve ing and cooing was almost al the air. Except for the argumen the grilling of meats, one seldc or hears any bickering or open f of temper among the Arvee, or children.

This rather calm exterior, upo tigation, seemed to derive from al lack of emotion. Eventually I a startling conclusion: The Ar drugged. True, the People ran alcohol, and the more exotic such as marijuana and airplar seem unknown to them. Yet would sit at my picnic table and the sure signs of drug abuse an drawal. An Arvee would becom agitated, waving his arms, slappi self, shouting and writhing. Ther er Arvee would come running helplessly racked body of the and spray his exposed flesh w Within a few minutes, the Off begin to work and within a ha or less, the victim would be normal. I began to notice that as rare to see an Arvee wit can of Off! as it was to fi more than 30 feet from his

In a rigorously controlled exp I attempted to duplicate these on my own body. I found imparted a slight tingling sensa my skin, but failed to give blissful calmness of the People. one has to become attuned to its ties before one attains the relea befuddlement of the habitual use

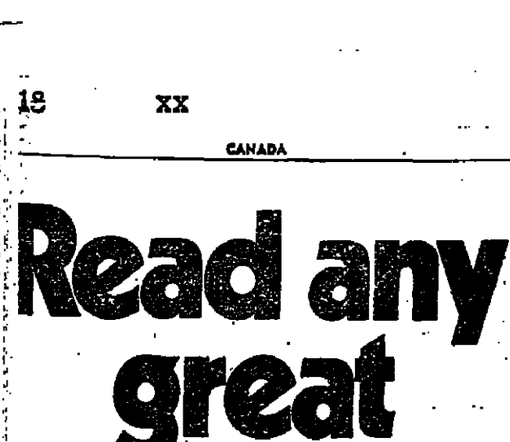
CANADA

Read any great vacations lately?



If you haven't, you haven't seen Air Canada's eye-popping new summer travel book.

It's page after page of the most tempting vacation ideas ever to lure you away from home.

Everything from Toronto's pulsating discos to Calgary's handclapping hoedowns. From a cruise on the Pacific to a lobster from the Atlantic. From the earthshaking roar of Niagara Falls to the hushed solitude of a virgin forest. From the stately elegance of the Château Frontenac (it looks like a castle, but it's really a hotel) to a remote fishing camp tucked away near Hudson Bay.

It's also page after page of every imaginable way to take it all in. Escorted tours that let you peek into every little nook and cranny. Unescorted tours that will satisfy your lust for wandering. By car. By motorhome. By ship. By plane. By the seat of your pants.

There's even a two-week railway odyssey that would have Ulysses eating his heart out.

One thing Air Canada's vacations won't eat is a hole in your wallet. Because our country is near, your dollars go far.

And because Air Canada flies more often to more places in Canada than any other airline, we'll be ready to go whenever you are.

So, don't leave home without leafing through our spectacular free vacation book. And don't leave home without the American Express Card either. It's good for your Air Canada tickets and tours, plus great meals and great buys in restaurants and in shops all across Canada.

Canada—so much to go for.

A World Of Tiny Nations

she wants to charge, enabling those ships to enter any foreign port freely, flying her flag. But the Republic of Minerva has thus far been unable to get itself officially recognized, so no income comes from ship registry. It does, however, have a certain political claim to existence. Shortly after the Declaration in 1972, Davis formally made his claim by building up a little tower of stones on one of the reefs and placing a battery-operated flasher and the Minervan flag (torch on a blue field) atop it. King Tauf'ahau Tupou responded by setting sail from Tonga, a couple of hundred miles to the northeast of Minerva, aboard the ship Olovaba with the entire 100-man Tonga Defense Force (recruited for the voyage from among prisoners). At the reefs they tore down the Minervan flag as the Tongan Police Band played the Tonga national anthem and Prime Minister Mahe U. Tupouniua read a Tongan sovereignty proclamation. Davis promptly flew to Nukualofa, the Tongan capital, for an audience with the King, but he was snubbed. "We can't for the life of us understand why the King should suddenly decide he wants the reefs," Davis commented. "He never had any use for them before." At present, while Minerva remains uninhabited, the conflict is dormant.

Ed Welles of Manset, Maine, a 35-year-old freelance journalist, is chief executive of the world's largest micronation. Oceanus (O or maybe F, depending upon your faith in Ed Welles). Its territory is nothing less than all the seas of the world, beyond the three-mile limit. Thus the Mediterranean is included, because the Strait of Gibraltar is wider than three miles, but Welles omits the Suez and Panama Canals. "We don't want those headaches anyway," he says. Welles plans to patrol his empire with PT boats and submarines abetted by a small air force. Again, income would come from ship registration, but this awaits an agreement by all the nations of the world to give Ed Welles sovereignty over the seas. Welles assures the world that there is no danger of his becoming a Napoleon: "In another three years," he says, citing the Oceanus constitution, "I have to retire for life."

As for his nation's present legality, Welles says, "Look, how does any government start out? Somebody says, 'I'm a baron, pay me taxes,' and he's in business. The U.S.A. said, 'We are,' and the country was born. In 1970 eight people said, 'We are,' and there was Oceanus." Welles issues passports, which are intended to end the problem of stateless persons, because anybody can get one. He says he once persuaded a Canadian immigration officer to stamp his passport. Welles also issues amateur radio broadcasting licenses with such call letters as O1AX and is rather hoping for some objection from the Federal Communications Commission. "If they give us any flak they are recognizing us," he says.

A tall, rangy sailing enthusiast, Welles, who styles himself Admiral of Oceanus, runs his empire from a 93-foot sailing schooner, Pilgrim, usually tied up in Boston harbor. It serves both as capitol and supreme court. Here the Oceanus Attorney General, Nathaniel Derman, three years ago charged a large oil company and its affiliates with polluting Oceanus territory with spills. The oil firms did not send anyone aboard to enter a plea.

Welles got the idea for Oceanus seven years ago when sailing through an oil slick off Bar Harbor. "I realized that if some authority did not stop pollution, within 20 years we'd have nothing but oil to sail in." He came ashore and drafted a constitution for ruling the seas. All nations are welcome to participate, and Welles hopes to start with landlocked countries, especially the new African republics, because "they have nothing to lose." Besides suing the oil compnies, Oceanus's major American action has been that it got a bill introduced in the United States Senate three years ago to establish the United States as an "Oceanus Congressional Nation." The chances of the bill ever reaching a vote are not considered good.

Shrike Island rates a straight F for fiction, but it gets an "A" for imagination. Mysteriously enough, its capital, Butchertown, shares a map location (Lat. 23° 08" N, Long. 82° 21" W) with Havana. The island is owned by the descendants of one Umberto D'Argento, also known as Erberto Hombre De Plata, who sighted it on St. Swithin's Day, 1580. Among island products is the national drink, the Shriek, composed of tequila, laudanum and syrup. After a bootlegging boom during prohibition the economy slumped until Shrike Island General Hospital (SIGH) began doing legal abortions. Liberalized United States laws have spoiled this business, however, and the treasury is empty.

Currency in $1.50 denominations pictures the founder—New York City publicist Herbert Silverman—as a jovial, jowly curlyhead with stout horn-rimmed glasses. Shrike's high society are the members of the Piranha Club, founded in 1759. The motto of Parliament, Periculum Minatur (Disaster Lurks), complements the D'Argento family slogan, Honor Last. Tourists are warned to beware of riotous revelers on Papa Herb Day every April 24th when natives, crazed with fermented crabapple juice, run rampant. At parties in his home in Dobbs Ferry, Founder Silverman can sometimes be observed serving drinks with cocktail napkins inscribed "Piranha Club, Butchertown." When guests tell of their terrific vacations on Shrike Island, or argue about the best way to fly there, Silverman is happy to let them work out the best route for themselves.

Actually existing wee lands include Sealand (another O), about the size of a baseball diamond, consisting of a steel platform like the ones used for oil-drilling, six miles off the English coast in the English Channel. Its self-styled prince, an English tax dodger named Roy Bates, once warded off British Customs craft by firing guns over their bows. Another country made up of tide-washed reefs and atolls is named the Republic of Morac-Songhrati-Meads, with its capital on Meads Island in the South China Sea—an island not marked in standard atlases. The republic claims all territory in a 700-mile sweep of water between the Philippines and Vietnam. Its officers have renamed these waters the Humanity Sea and have threatened to confiscate an oil rig set up by Shell. The death penalty is prescribed for those making claims on the republic's property. The yellow and black flag displays two figs in a white star, the national anthem is Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the national motto is "Conscience, Intelligence, Courage, Principia Non Homines." Because of the care with which all state documents are kept free of any telltale postal address, this one gets a B for bogus.

Prince Leonard George Casley, another tax-denying individualist, founded his Hutt River Province Principality (O) on 18,500 acres of land in West Australia, 350 miles from Perth, five years ago and is still issuing stamps and currency of his own devising. It apparently survives on a modest tourist business. April 21st is the local holiday commemorating the Anniversary of the Secession.

Two republics rated O have arisen in the Bahamas off the Florida coast—at least they exist in the minds of their founders. One, named Leicester Hemingway, has staked out a tiny dot of land north of Great Bahama Island as the site of the new Republic of Tierra del Mar. Another, a former Minerva adherent named Mike Oliver who used to sell Nevada real estate, has struck out on his own in an attempt to take over the Bahamas island of Abaco, 200 miles east of Miami. There is nothing in his way except the 6,500 other residents of the island and the British Government. Oliver, a staunch supporter of capitalism, says that "Abaconians are determined not to become another banana republic."

Looking over the long list of would-be countries, Professor Blaustein is not impressed. But then, Blaustein thinks that some recognized nations are incomprehensible. "Look at the Republic of the Maldives," he says. "It's the smallest country in the United Nations, doesn't even have an embassy in Washington. The only word we can get from there is secondhand, from Sri Lanka officials." In trying to distinguish between lands that seem to have a right to sovereignty and those that do not qualify, Blaustein says, "There is a big difference between an entity where you may have an ethnic group, or a group with a specific political interest, as opposed to an individual who lands on a pile of guano in the South Pacific and says, 'This is my country.' There have to be some attributes of sovereignty, and who gives this is the world community, by diplomatic recognition.'"

A professor of international relations at UCLA, Ciro Zoppo, agrees: "Without recognition an area cannot become a nation." Commenting on Bud Davis's claim to the Minerva reefs, he thinks "Tonga could demand that the United States do something about controlling the behavior of its citizens."

But the dream dies hard. As Herb Silverman has discovered, there is a will to believe, and not only among the initiates. On airplane flights he shows matchbooks from the Piranha Club or the insignia of the Shrike Island Legislative Assembly to fellow passengers. "Many will say, 'I've been there!'" Silverman reports. "One fellow swore he had done some scuba diving off the Shrike Island reefs. A pilot claimed he'd overflown Shrike many times." Silverman's experience seems to prove the wisdom of the inscription on Shrike Island currency. It read, "The man who speaks with conviction is a majority."

Summer, 1976. One of the world's great hotels sails to the top of the world.

The fjords of Norway. A thousand years ago, the Vikings sailed these rugged, beautiful fjords in dragon-bowed warships.

And now, this Summer, you can sail these same deep blue waters in a sleek white ship of the Royal Viking fleet.

Take a two-week North Cape cruise with us, and you'll explore a dozen fjords, each more spectacular than the last. You'll visit quaint Norwegian farming villages. And cross the Arctic Circle to the North Cape. As you stand here in the eerie glow of the Midnight Sun, you'll know for sure that you're at the top of the world.

Or you can take a two-week Russia/Europe cruise where you'll discover the incredible art treasures of Leningrad. The magic of Copenhagen. The cosmopolitan charm of Northern Europe's capitals. The canals of Amsterdam. And sail through the fascinating Kiel Canal.

Or you can combine both sailings into a month-long cruise you'll never forget.

Your ship is the all First Class Royal Viking Star or Royal Viking Sky. Of Norwegian registry. And spirit. Designed to bring you all the comforts of a great hotel, even at the top of the world.

Your stateroom is going to be big and comfortable, with a sweeping view of the sea. (94% of all passengers have outside staterooms.)

The dining room is set high on an upper deck, walled with windows and large enough to serve every passenger on board at a single, relaxed seating.

At dinner, you'll be served entrees like Braised Long Island Duckling Bigarrade. Veal Cordon Bleu. Choice Filet Mignon.

And to see that you're well taken care of, there are three crew members for every five passengers.

Every day, there's more to do on board than you'll find at most great resorts. There's skeet shooting. A gym. A sauna. A heated pool. You can browse in the library. Take in the lectures in our enrichment program. Catch a film in the ship's theatre. And every evening at sea, there's a whole variety of live entertainment in our lounges and bars; everything from Broadway show tunes to quiet, romantic dance melodies.

From June through August, we have six North Cape cruises, and four Russia/Europe sailings, round trip from Copenhagen. Plus a total of seven 28-day North Cape/Russia/Europe cruise combinations. For complete information —and reservations—see your travel agent. And see him soon. Or call us collect at 212-757-0921.

SWISSAIR+
We take on the world's most demanding travellers.

At last. A Panama Canal cruise that includes Glacier Bay.

Of all the cruises we offer in every part of the world, our Trans-Canal cruises between Florida and California are among the most popular.

Followed closely by our Alaska/Canada cruises.

So it was only logical to put the two together. And that's what we've done. On May 22, you can board ship in New York, sail to Ft. Lauderdale, and cruise with us all the way to Glacier Bay in 35 days.

First, you'll sail to the golden beaches of Caribbean islands. To colorful ports in Central and South America.

You'll have an unforgettable eight-hour daylight crossing of the Panama Canal. Through the huge locks. Over Gatun Lake. Past walls of dense tropical jungle that seem close enough to touch.

You'll cruise the Mexican Riviera. Call at Acapulco. And Puerto Vallarta.

We'll take you to Los Angeles. And San Francisco. Where you start another adventure entirely: our Alaska/Canada cruise.

You'll sail north to the charming Canadian ports of Victoria, Vancouver and Prince Rupert. To old Alaska frontier towns like Sitka. And Haines. To Juneau, the historic capital.

And then we'll take you all the way to spectacular Glacier Bay, where twenty colossal rivers of ice come together. And you'll have a full day's sailing to take it all in.

Finally, we'll take you back to California. With enough memories to last for years.

The entire cruise is 35 days. And every day of it, you'll enjoy the all First-Class sailing style of the Royal Viking Sea. Of Norwegian registry. And spirit. Designed to bring you all the comforts of a great hotel.

Your stateroom will be spacious and comfortable. With a sweeping view of the sea. (94% of all passengers have outside staterooms.)

The dining room is set high on an upper deck, walled with windows, and large enough to serve every passenger on board at a single, relaxed seating.

At dinner, you can choose from entrees like Braised Long Island Duckling Bigarrade. Veal Cordon Bleu. Choice Filet Mignon. You'll be impressed by the service too: there are three crew members for every five passengers.

And there's more to do on board than you'll find at most great resorts. There's skeet shooting. A gym. A sauna. A heated pool. You can browse in our library. Play bridge. Take in the lectures in our enrichment program. Catch a film in the ship's theater. And enjoy a whole variety of live entertainment in our lounges and bars.

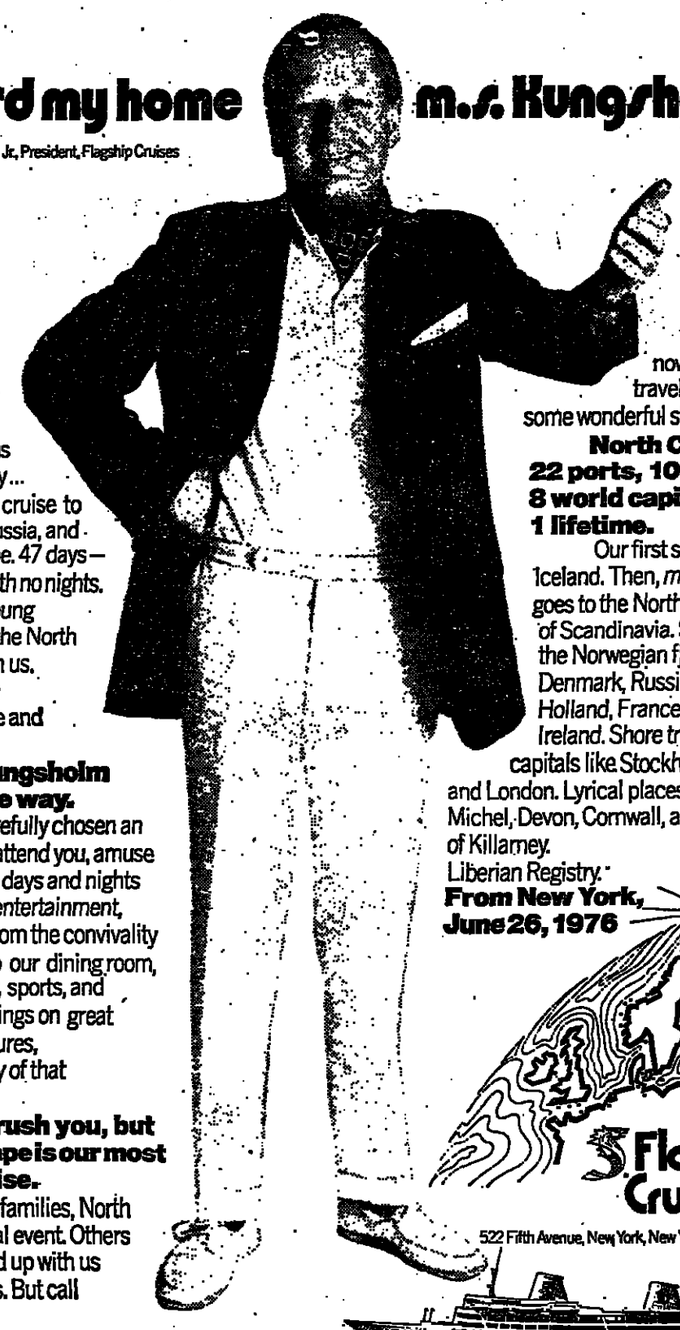
"Sail with me to the Lands of the Midnight Sun.

Aboard my home m.s. Kungsholm."

Øivind Lorentzen, Jr., President, Flagship Cruises



Of all our cruises, my favorite is the one that takes us home to Norway... the North Cape cruise to Scandinavia, Russia, and the top of Europe. 47 days—some of them with no nights. With so many young people sharing the North Cape cruise with us. m.s. Kungsholm sparkles with life and fun.

The Kungsholm Touch all the way.

We've carefully chosen an exciting staff to attend you, amuse you, and fill your days and nights with great food, entertainment, and activities. From the convivality of our lounges to our dining room, movies, dancing, sports, and fascinating briefings on great on-shore adventures, you'll need plenty of that Midnight Sun.

Not to rush you, but the North Cape is our most popular cruise.

For some families, North Cape is an annual event. Others have been signed up with us for many months. But call now. Your travel agent still has some wonderful staterooms left.

North Cape: 22 ports, 10 countries, 8 world capitals, 1 lifetime.

Our first stop: Reykjavik, Iceland. Then, m.s. Kungsholm goes to the North Cape at the top of Scandinavia. South through the Norwegian fjords to Denmark, Russia, Germany, Holland, France, England, and Ireland. Shore trips to stunning capitals like Stockholm, Paris and London. Lyrical places like Mont St. Michel, Devon, Cornwall, and the Lakes of Killarney.

Wheeling Through Wales

to enter a kitchen passed through hot fat on the way out. We'd been five hours a day strenuously pumping and were gaining weight.

Fresh fruits and vegetables, gloriously evident in the markets, rarely appeared on restaurant tables, so we began carrying some around with us—and suffered the lack of a small handlebar basket, which would also have been useful for camera, notebook and map.

Saint Asaph is the smallest "city" (10,000 people) with the smallest cathedral in Britain. A religious center since the Dark Ages, it has the first Bible translated into Welsh; a site between two streams, the Elwy and the Clwyd, that it shares with some sheep; and a leafy, lazy approach road swooping over an arched bridge that ends abruptly as a stone wall when the road shoots up at a 50-degree angle. And we had to dismount.

We stayed in the Kinmer Arms, at the foot looking up at the cathedral. A 600-year-old inn, it was run by a couple who liked music and who owned the first expensive stereo equipment we'd seen in Wales. The rate was the same as the night before, the seemingly classic $13 (for two) bed and breakfast—sometimes called just B and B. Once again our bikes were stored in the beer shed. The Welsh, men and women, drink enormous quantities of beer, and public houses reserve lots of space for its income and outgo, always a prime location with easy access and a tight lock. Thieves weren't a grave worry, the proprietor told us, but graver than they used to be. Still, the bedrooms had no keys and the front door always stood open, so they weren't as grave a worry as they might have been.

During the following day several fine showers fell. People caught on the street didn't hurry for cover with their faces screwed up, the way New Yorkers do, as if it were raining worms. Instead, they complimented them . . . "Lovely rains they've been, haven't they?"

Sometimes a shaft of sunlight piercing the clouds picked out a single tinselly slash of rain drops to shine on, as it picked out certain roofs, certain trees and riffs of brook. The blue of the sky was something we watched out for, a patch showing briefly through crumpled layers of gray clouds.

We explored Saint Asaph's old streets on foot, alone. So far as we could tell, only four other tourists were here, staying at our inn, the men "mates" in the biscuit commerce in Liverpool. We spent a jolly evening together drinking bitter beer and singing American popular songs dating back to the early 1940's played on an electric organ by the proprietor, who confided that, except for a private, domestic difficulty, he would have been a Beatle.

After two more nights we set out for Ruthin. It was only 15 miles—three loops of Central Park—but depending on the stops we made and the terrain it could take the better part of a day. After a pleasantly rolling passage through meadows and fields, stopping to watch two sheep dogs send an unstable flock of sheep flowing neatly through a narrow gate, and to have a pint at an old coach stop—all the while using almost solely the medium gear—the road, as before Saint Asaph, suddenly shot up: the approach to Ruthin. These towns were built high for defense, and almost all had their medieval fortress, Ruthin's now a hotel, the Ruthin Castle, where peacocks paced the lawns. On the tour circuit, it was the first we'd found fully booked, but we did make dinner reservations for that evening's medieval banquet, hopeful of a cuisine formed in an age too dark to have known about Crisco.

Ruthin was clearly a tourist favorite, and we found one remaining room at the Eagles Inn Hotel, where the innkeepers, Philip and Sylvia Madden, had generously refrained from cashing in on the squeeze, the double rate a still-reasonable $17. As was customary, mom cooked, pop tended bar, both did it well and, liking talk, ran a kind of nightly salon, dropped in on by people familiar from "Under Milkwood." It was here we heard described for the first time the Horseshoe Pass, a road running high over the Clwydian Range into the Vale of Llangollen.

The pass seemed something of a legend—postcards pictured it—and although there was a way we could go around, it began to take on for us a special meaning. The trip was almost over; after a couple of days in Llangollen we would take the train south, to Swansea, then back to London. What a flourish to end it! Those sometimes niggling ups and downs forever smoothed, obliterated by that last, long, spectacular sweep down from the top of the Horseshoe Pass.

In the next morning's freshness, we scarcely noticed the sharpening angle of the road beginning to rise. We'd expected worse. Only after an hour did we even shift to lowest gear. And now began to nudge another challenge: As the ultimate test of our new 10-speed bicycles, why not try pumping up the Horseshoe Pass?

As the way grew steeper, and I labored more, the landscape fell away—purple mountains beyond the moors, stone houses clinging to the steep sides. Head down, for me only the roadbed remained, alongside the tiny yellow wildflowers. The drag of the packs over the rear wheel, their weight and my own—even the weight of the bicycle itself—had suddenly, crushingly, descended.

Through a roar in my ears, I heard my husband's voice: "Hey! You've got a flat!" It was only a small sliver of glass, easily repaired. But with all the extras we had added, the most vital we had forgotten: tire-patch kit.

EUROPE 50% OFF

New ways to save in '76! Sail the Queen Elizabeth 2 and save 50% of your sea fare home! Save 50% on hotels! Save 50% on meals and cocktails!

If you thought the savings on Cunard's "Europe 50% Off" program were great in 1975, just look what we've lined up for you in 1976. Anyone bound for Europe is bound to save. Read on.

Round-trip sea passengers save 50% on return fare.

This year for the first time you can sail the Queen Elizabeth 2 to Europe—then return on selected sailings for 50% of the regular one-way price. Cunard's all-new excursion fares make this great saving possible. And you can spend as many as 38 days in Europe.

All passengers save 50% on hotels and meals.

Every QE 2 passenger can get 50% off the cost of rooms, meals and cocktails at any of 21 splendid hotels. Cunard hotels in Britain. Inter-Continental hotels throughout Europe. Savings are sizeable—as much as $200 per person.

Air/sea passengers get low sea excursion fares.

Even passengers whose time is limited can still enjoy five glorious days of sea travel. Jet British Airways (the airline that takes good care of you) between the United States and Europe. Then sail the QE 2 the other way and get the same low sea excursion fare as our round-trip sea passengers.

NEVIS

To the Editor:

When our friends ask, "Where have you been lately?" we reply, "Nevis." They invariably come back with, "Where's that?" So, the article by Robert W. Stock, "Nevis: Hey, Mon! Not to Worry" (Travel Section, March 14), was a boon to us and our inquiring friends. But will your write-up change "The Queen of the Caribbee?" I think not.

First of all, Nevis has very limited attractions for fun-seeking tourists. That is one of its unique appeals: in the tourist sense, there's nothing to do there.

Secondly, the hassle to get there discourages even the adventurous. We flew Pittsburgh-San Juan-Antigua (overnight layover)-St. Kitts-Nevis. It's tough to make all connections in one day unless you're in or near New York.

In lieu of renting a Mini-Mox, we used a local taxi to take us around the island. Ralph Hatton, our young Nevesian owner-driver, was a superb guide and historian of local lore.

We left a bundle of unread books. The tranquillity of the environment became too distracting to concentrate on the printed page.

SPAIN'S SUPERHIGHWAY

To the Editor:

It's clear from Benjamin Welles's account of the "Autopista: Spain's New Superhighway Beside the Mediterranean" (Travel Section, March 14) that sentiment was not completely in favor of the road. Despite the heavy thumb of Francisco Franco, courageous women rallied and linked arms in an attempt — unsuccessful but nevertheless praiseworthy— to prevent bulldozers from leveling their properties.

Displays of governmental muscle or—as they are more politely referred to—exercises of "eminent domain," aren't unknown here. A difference, however, is evident in the mode of recompense. Prompt payment makes feasible the purchase of land in another locality.

It's one European vacation you can still afford.

Beautiful resort hotels—with a beach on the sparkling Aegean—are still from $10 a day. For two.

Dinner of freshly caught red snapper and wine at a waterfront café is still around $4.

In Greece, amazingly enough, your hard-earned dollar is still worth a dollar.

Ironically, you're getting the most fascinating country on earth in the bargain.

You'll romp on golden-sand beaches. Swim in the bluest water you've ever seen. Cruise to fabled Greek isles. Dance to the soulful music of the bouzouki.

And hear the echoes of 4000 years of history at every turn. Places like Delphi and Knossos and Olympia where the ancient legends seem to come alive.

There's no place on earth like Greece.

How did it go for you?

There's always something up in the Business/Financial Pages of The New York Times. (And sometimes down, too.)

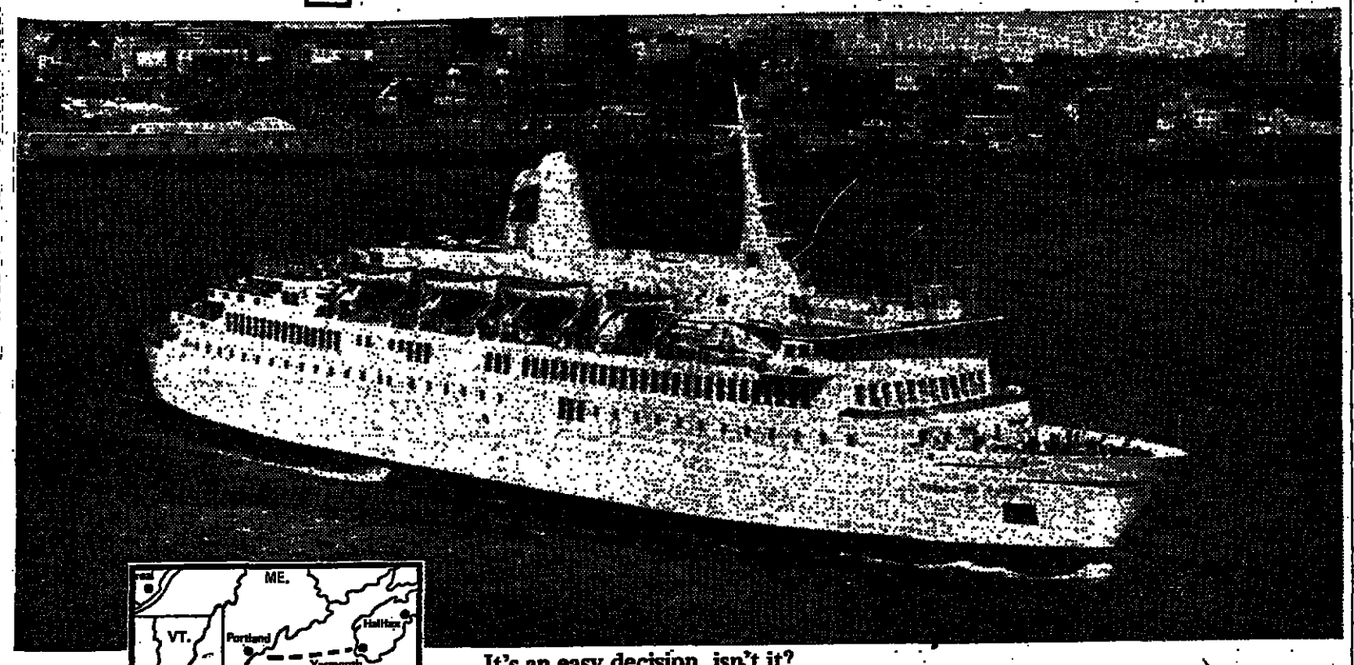
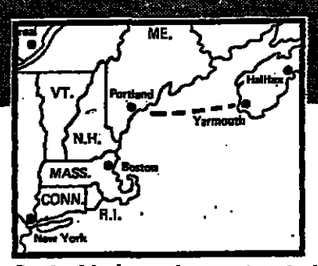
Which would you rather do?

☐ Drive your car to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia (858 miles)

☐ Sail your car to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia (10 hours)





Portland is the southernmost port connecting Maine with Yarmouth, Nova Scotia and the natural gateway to Atlantic Canada...only two hours from Boston and seven hours from the New York area.

It's an easy decision, isn't it?

Can you think of a better way to save energy...both in gasoline and yourself, too?

Both the Norwegian M/S Bolero and the Swedish M/S Prince of Fundy offer you the easy drive-on, drive-off car facilities with space for up to 200 vehicles.

You'll save time...at least 16 hours of actual driving. You'll save gas by eliminating 858 miles.

It's a relaxing 10-hour crossing and there are two sailings daily, morning and evening, from both Portland and Yarmouth.

Sample life aboard a real ocean cruise-liner...dining, dancing, gift shops, casino, lounges...or plain relaxing in a comfortable cabin or poolside in the sun.

MANY MONEY-SAVING PACKAGE PLANS AVAILABLE FOR THE ECONOMY-MINDED VACATION FAMILY

Motorist's package for two people and automobile...one-way or round trip.

"The Explorer"...an extended 5 days/5 nights package with four days and nights in Nova Scotia.

"The Discoverer"...a new package that allows for an extended vacation on your own after three nights in Nova Scotia.

(Without car) The 22-hour Mini-Cruise, or 46-hour Maxi-Cruise, which allows for 26-hour stopover in Yarmouth.

There's more to us than Moscow and Leningrad.

Come to Central Asia and Siberia. It's another vacation.

In Central Asia, Sheherezade's fabulous tales are not just told, they still happen. Among the mosques, minarets and marketplaces. In Tamerlane's fabled Samarkand, colorful reminder of a glorious past. In exotic Khiva on the banks of the legendary Amu-Darya or historic Bukhara. In Alma-Ata, known for its apples and breathtaking scenery. In Ashkhabad, our "rug capital", where you could still find a magic carpet and explore ancient ruins. In Frunze and Dushanbe, outstanding examples of 20th century towns in settings of great natural beauty. If that doesn't satisfy you, let us whisk you to Siberia, a vast land of natural and man-made wonders, including Baikal, the world's deepest lake, the endless taiga and ultra-modern Bratsk. Central Asia. Siberia. Just two of the different and original vacation ideas we have for you in all 15 republics of the Soviet Union.
